Abstract

This section begins by explaining the purpose and focus of the study/research, followed by the background of the research problem (or conversely the background of the new research followed by explaining the purpose and focus of the study/research. The method of how the data was collected must be written in the next sentence, including the material object used in research without descriptions Findings and research results can be written in the next two or three sentences. The last sentence is the contribution of the research to relate to the discipline.

Keywords: Keyword1; Keyword2; Keyword3.

1. Introduction

This section systematically introduces the research background. There are two ways to display the background; first, to show the context of the research: why the problem arose and what research gaps generated the problem. Authors can provide research novelty by mapping previous research. The research question may explicitly appear in this section, while the thesis argument should be clearly stated in this section as well.[1]
