

Article Interview with RoseMary

When interviewing my grandmother she couldn't recall some stuff about the war also because she was born a year after the war. My grandmother was born in Peru, Lima. Her family was living there during the world war. My grandmother, Rosemary couldn't recall ever having a conversation with her parents about the war. She does recall some of the history how Peru were involved in the war. Peru was the first country in South America to start to let in refugees and the country was being flooded with people. The native peruvian peoples lives were affected because resources became more slim, they were starting to have a shortage of water and lots of food which caused the people to suffer, even during her early years she could recall that there were little toys and basic resources. I then asked her the question about if the Sharp family were affected by the war and she responded by saying that it has left us with fear of the nuclear bomb, it didn't only affect our families lives but so many people all around the war. "The world then had another thing to worry about". Many families became aware of the power, hatred and disgust that racism causes. The events in Germany towards the jews was just another wake up call that should have been given more thought and been taught a lesson from it. She said that the whole world was clearly alarmed and Peru were very paranoid and that they were "cheering for England and the United States".
