Abstract This article explores the social, economic, and political relations of Balinese transmigrants in South Konawe Regency from 1968 to 2020. The study finds that Balinese migration began in 1953, shortly after Indonesia's independence, with a significant wave occurring following the eruption of Mount Agung. The disaster prompted the relocation of many Balinese from the densely populated island to other regions, including South Konawe, where their arrival began in 1968. Using historical methodology as the primary analytical and interpretive tool, this study draws on archival records, interviews, and relevant literature. Balinese transmigrants have played a pivotal role in shaping the region's socio-economic and political landscape. Socially, they brought Hindu cultural values and distinct Balinese traditions that interacted dynamically with local cultures. Economically, they were primarily settled in agricultural areas and demonstrated high productivity from the outset, introducing more intensive farming techniques and efficient land management. Politically, the Balinese community has shown growing involvement in local governance, contributing to a more inclusive and participatory political environment. The blending of Balinese and local cultures has significantly influenced the region's development across multiple dimensions.

I. INTRODUCTION

This section should provide background information, research problems, objectives, and the significance of the study. Clearly explain the context of the research and why the topic is important. The introduction should also include a short overview of previous studies and identify the research gap that this study aims to address.

II. LITERATURE REVIEW / THEORETICAL FRAMEWORK / MATERIAL

A. Third-Level Subheading

Explain relevant studies in detail here.

1. Fourth-Level Subheading

Discuss the theoretical basis for the study.

a. Fifth-Level Subheading

Provide empirical evidence here.

(1) Second Key Point

Explanation of the first key point.

Summarize and critically discuss existing literature related to your study. Show how your research is positioned in relation to earlier studies and theories. Highlight the conceptual or theoretical framework that supports your research.

III. METHODS

Describe the research design, data collection methods, instruments, participants (if applicable), and procedures used. Justify why these methods were chosen and explain how the data were analyzed.

IV. RESULTS

Present the research results in a clear and organized manner. Use tables, figures, or charts if needed (with proper numbering and titles). Discuss the meaning of the findings, and explain the implications.

V. CONCLUSION

Summarize the main findings of the study, state the contributions to knowledge, and mention possible limitations. Provide suggestions or recommendations for future research or practice.

Financing

The authors did not receive financing for the development of this research.

Conflict of Interest

The authors declare that there is no conflict of interest.
