

The machine and the garden are each important in their own right. The garden gives us resources and a place to stay. The machine keeps us stable and without strain. Let's focus more on our garden than the machine. The machine is hurting our garden. It is not possible to have a balance until those who own the machine turn it off. I don't mean permanently turn it off, I mean turn it down so we can properly take care of our garden.

Gardens are nice, you take care of them and they grow for you. They flourish and provide as long as you treat them kindly. The human body is the same in many ways. If you take care of your mind and body, it will grow and flourish for you, but if you don't, you will hurt and it will no longer serve you as you need. Your garden is constantly under attack by the machine. Our bodies can only grow under the right conditions. Things like quality time, fresh air, and passions are all things that help us grow. All of these things are under attack by the machine.

The machine is just that, a machine. It is a well-oiled thing that has been upkeep by the upper 2% for decades. It keeps the owners of the machine rich and comfortable while the workers of the machine suffer. The machine is the systems of modern day designed to keep people down. The machine breaks up families, gets people killed, and keeps people poor. That machine eats up the employees' time and relationships. How can you expect your garden to grow and flourish if you're too busy stressing yourself out over a machine that doesn't care for you?

You might be saying, "I'm not an employee. I don't work for this machine." But the hard truth is, as long as you are complacent to this machine, you are an employee and just as big of a problem as the owners. Some other people also believe that the machine benefits everybody. So, if the machine benefits everyone, why are there people who can pay to go to space for 11 minutes and call it feminism? People paying for space travel, while some families down here can't even afford food.

In conclusion there can be no balance between the garden and the machine until the owners of the machine stop being greedy and actually care for their employees. The owners of the machine don't give people livable wages, hours, or working conditions. Without these three simple things people are guaranteed to not have balance. Employees don't have time to be home with their families. Employees are being payed so little they have to have multiple jobs just to live. They expect employees to work to the bone to make the owners rich. When the employees are all gone then whos gonna work for their machine then?
