Synopsis:

Story of a person in a world of Androids. They discover they are in fact not an android and must reconcile with this fact. Bringing them to ask the question: what is an android? To which they come to try and learn about the differences between the two, while trying to go on a quest to become an android.

Thematically the story is about trying to identify the differences between humans and artificial intelligence, finding no discernible difference. A retelling of the age old story of an inanimate thing wanting to be human, but in reverse. And through ending with the human becoming inhuman, the story makes people think of this natural bias towards humanity. But also importantly the potential future of stepping outside of humanity and becoming something else.

I'm thinking of a story book type tale. With the human simply called human by the narrator. And a children's book ethereal type of feeling.

The human had a creator that imbued them with false memories. When asked why they made the human, the creator simply answers with "To see if I could."

The creator then grants the human's wish to become like everyone else, to become an Android. But before he does, the creator points out that he in a way already was like everyone else. He was made in a lab like anyone else.
