Debbie Morris, M.Sc.

Debbie's life-long passion has been to help organizations make the most of change through the power of collaborative problem-solving. She is retired from a career in organization development, where she was an internal and external consultant in strategic planning, meeting facilitation and planning, training, and change management. She earned a Bachelor's in Public Policy at Duke University, a Master's degree in Community Psychology from North Carolina State, and studied with a legion of thought leaders in organization development throughout her career.

After leaving corporate life, she supported a leading edge program called The Collaborative Operating System, and served as Chief Project Accelerator for small businesses. In the "second bloom" phase of her life, she is still passionate about the power of collaboration to solve complex problems, and is dedicated to study and writing about how leaders, teams, and organizations flourish.
