Subject Line: Why your writings are INEFFECTIVE and UNIMPRESSIVE

When you start reading the words and the sentences you put together, what do you truly see?

Is it a well-done essay that triggers massive emotional motivation, catches the reader's attention, and makes the reader fully concentrate with every word, excited to step into the next paragraph to fuel his curiosity?

An essay that every person falls in love with and reads multiple times?

Or do you see just a bunch of words anyone can put together, fueled with countless grammar and spelling mistakes that came from a lack of concentration and inspiration?

Here's the kicker,

As a reader can you even bother yourself to read it till the end to discover the point from those words or do you run away looking for something INTERESTING?

If you are tired of this feeling and you want to take your writing and your concentration to the next level,

Subject Line: Wish I Talked To My Brother Earlier...

When something really big happens, it can go one of two ways.

It was a typical morning nothing special just me, my PC, my black note filled with a ton of tasks, and a cup of coffee by my side.

Yet, this morning, it was different, something weird was happening to me like I wasn't focused enough to even answer my client's questions

He was really unsatisfied with my last work.

My Sale's copy - a puzzle without coherence, and the viewers...

They weren't enough to even fill three football teams.

I was really ashamed to hear those mean words coming out of his mouth.

This is impossible! I poured my heart into that copy. After six hours of harsh work without a single break, I stayed awake until 04:35 a.m. that night, to write a copy that barely made a dent in the virtual world.

I began to doubt my skills, facing what felt like writer's block.

In a moment like this, I had two options.

I could either give up, go find a job, and say goodbye to my dreams.

Or I could muster the strength to rise to the occasion and find a way to win.

Post-traumatic stress or post-traumatic growth,

The choice was mine

Thankfully my brother gave me a priceless secret that not only gave me the key to bounce back from that dire moment but 5X my productivity and what I had been making before.

Subject Line: One of the most important rules for writing creative copy:
Don't contain yourself

There is a secret behind some writer's productivity and high success

It's not because they have the talent or the high IQ level, and without a doubt, it's not because they get lucky with their first book or article.

It's the art of dealing with the writer's block.

Sadly, every writer is going to face a block where he cannot come up with a single useful idea or write a meaningful line.

The good news, is I am going to share with you a trick to deal with this thing
let's say the first step to overcoming writer's block

It's the Copy takeaway: When looking for a creative solution, pay attention to what's happening around you.

In my case, I was walking and caught myself paying attention to my surroundings. Was I eavesdropping? Yes, we all do it.

You're a writer in a public place surrounded by different people everyone has his own view of this world.

A phrase may be overhead at the table next to you. A sign at an aisle end cap catches your attention. A billboard about motorcycle insurance sparks an idea

These signs are all around us all the time

Have you ever read a book and found a quote that makes you double-take?

Or watch a movie or show, and a line makes us pause and rewind four, or five times because it inspired a great line of a copy?

Being more aware and being open to finding clues helps you never run out of creative ideas

If you aren't looking for clues, they will walk right passed you. And you are back to staring at a blank screenwriting
