

Everyone has a lot to say about single mothers, and to them as well. There's no one scorned like a woman whose partner has left her to raise children on her own, except women who actively choose single motherhood; whether it's by leaving their partner or having children by themselves via IVF/adoption.

At some point, one has either said or heard things about single mothers. For the people who have said and still have something to say, enough time has passed, it's time to stop. Best believe, single mothers have heard it all — they no longer want to hear these again;

1. “The child needs a father” — The child already has a father - remember, he makes up 50 percent of their DNA - he is just not in the picture, and that's ok.
2. “Who will the boy child look up to as a manly figure?” — Plenty of other men in his life, uncles? granddad? Any man in his life can serve as a manly figure, it doesn't have to be his dad.
3. “Who will provide for the child?” — The mother, of course, who else? Women don't willingly choose to raise children on their own when they know they can't provide.
4. “No man will want you again” — You're so close actually; it's she who doesn't want a man, not the other way around.
5. “You will regret this” — People also end up regretting getting married, that still hasn't stopped anyone from marrying.
6. “You are being very selfish” — Raising a child will always be a selfless act, even when it's done alone.
7. “Your child will end up broken” — Funny how women are considered the best for raising kids, but also simultaneously the worst.
