

Wacky Bobert Tax Fraud Exposed

Wacky Bobert. Some may know him as the friendly neighborhood weirdo with a summer home on a deserted island. Some, like the world's smartest hobo, know him as a strange acquaintance. Ever since the trial last Thursday, however, he is seen only as a criminal. Mr. Bobert went to Cranbrook, got a college level education in math, (though he still remained remarkably unintelligent in every other subject,) and soon moved to Iowa. After moving, he became trapped in a similar situation to Devin Billiams, but he was dumber. Desperate for gold doubloons, a young Mr. Bobert smuggled himself and his friend Country Steve to a deserted island by buying a plane ticket and legally going on "vacation." Once he was on the island, he and Steve dug a moat around the island, built a house, and used Mr. Bobert's incredible math skills and Country Steve's southern charm to successfully get away with tax fraud. Famous pilot and middle-aged teen, Cat Elizabeth, finally noticed that maybe normal people don't dress sacks of cash as people and smuggle them aboard planes, and decided to report Mr. Bobert and Country Steve to the authorities. They confessed immediately and were sentenced to a life without country music, which for Country Steve was devastating.

Another Interview with the World's Smartest Hobo

Reporter: Hello, Devin. I understand that you and Mr. Bobert were friends in high school, correct?

Billiams: That is correct.

Reporter: Now Devin, if you could say anything to Mr. Bobert after all that's happened, what would you say?

Billiams: How much did you say he stole again?

Reporter: Several billion dollars.

Billiams: Hmm, billions? Okay, okay. That's impressive, but I'm definitely better than him. He has a moat-surrounded island and has successfully committed tax fraud, but he can only do math. I was better than him at everything else in school, and I get to live under a luxurious piece of cardboard.

Reporter: I'm gonna tell him you said that.
