This program requires that a student must remain in good academic standing (see Laurentian University Program Regulations) and demonstrate professional suitability in Indigenous social work. Professional suitability requires an understanding of cultural commonalities and differences that affect helping relationships with Indigenous peoples and an awareness of holistic ways of knowing (spiritual, emotional, physical and mental). It requires comprehension of traditional knowledge, worldview and theoretical frameworks for practice. While engaged in field practices, students are expected to abide by all of the School of Indigenous Relations, university and professional codes of conduct and to respect the particular standards of the workplace they have chosen. The School of Indigenous Relations reserves the right to expel a student who, notwithstanding their academic performance, fails to adhere to ethical and professional standards incumbent upon members of a helping profession.

By accepting admission to the School of Indigenous Relations, Indigenous Social Work program, you accept the requirements and expectations of the program herein described and understand that failure to meet these may require withdrawal or transfer into an alternate program of study.
