BACKSTORY.

In the middle of the 20th century, a group of disillusioned and disenfranchised individuals from various walks of life came together, depressed and outraged by their condition. Together, they formed a revolutionary organization.

They rejected the hierarchical structures of government and the ruling class that they believed had led to their unfortunate lives. They spread their radicalism, saying that true freedom and justice could only be achieved through the complete dismantling of oppressive institutions.

This organization, known as the "People's Anarchist Movement," began as a loose network of activists and agitators, working to spread anarchist ideology and challenge the status quo. However, as the group grew in size and influence, they began to engage in more direct action.

Going against the fundamental concepts of Anarchy, the group established a small Council to oversee and conduct the population of their movement. This council altered their propaganda to their needs, taking advantage of the furor they had previously created to profit, while still appearing as a powerful Anarchist operation.

The People's Anarchist Movement carried out a series of bold and audacious heists, targeting the wealthiest and most powerful members of society. The unknowing saw themselves as modern-day Robin Hoods, stealing from the rich to give back to the poor and to fund their revolutionary activities.

This money rarely ever reached the hands of the needy, as they so believed, but was harnessed by the Council, and reinvested into opulence and luxury for the highest members of the organization.

The group's leaders, known only by their pseudonyms, remained hidden in the shadows, carefully orchestrating each operation and evading law enforcement. The People's Anarchist Movement became notorious for their skill and audacity, and their legend only grew as they continued to defy the authorities.

Over time, the organization grew in size and ambition, perhaps to their detriment. Expanding their operations beyond theft and into more violent and destructive activities. They carried out bombings, targeted assassinations, and other acts of terror, all in the name of their anarchist ideology. And money. Everyone likes money.

Despite the efforts of law enforcement, the People's Anarchist Movement remained a powerful and dangerous force, operating in the shadows and striking fear into the hearts of the wealthy and powerful. Their actions were condemned by many within the anarchist movement, who believed that violence and terrorism only served to undermine their cause.

Their lies caught up with them, and their wealth was discovered. The Council was declared corrupt by the people of the organization, and chased out of the country.

Now, a small ring of "Anarchists" are looking to start their movement in New York City, carrying only what they could flee with from their last endeavor.
