

A new language-teaching narrative for a 21st-century democracy

Since the late 1950s, two key socio-political factors beyond the academy have limited the range of languages taught on US campuses, shaping the overall conception of what language education can and should accomplish in a society. Securitization of linguistic knowledge has been the first factor, meaning that language and area studies education has been expanded (and at times, contracted) in the service of national security and economic agendas. Privatization of the benefits of this knowledge has been the second, interpreting language learning as a form of “investment” in self or human “capital.” Together, these two paradigms have outweighed all other considerations, including student backgrounds and interests, the pursuit of new forms of knowledge, discovery, and reflection, crucial new methods and directions in academic research, Indigenous and endangered language preservation or reclamation, concerns with linguistic justice, and, last but not least, civic needs in a society with no fewer than 350 home languages.

Overshadowed and outfunded by the national security paradigm, the community of language and area studies professionals in the academy has exercised comparably little control, both over the narrative of why teach languages and the range of languages deemed fit to learn. Our attempts to attract new language-learners with college course descriptions, academic majors fair slogans, department website recruitment messages, and professional association reports have too often relied on words borrowed from the logics of securitization and privatization. This habit of opportunism has colluded with even longer-entrenched ethnonationalist undertone of our curricula, textbooks, and publicity materials, which tend to map a single language onto a single country (monolingualism), perpetuate the divide between “native” and “non-native speakers” (linguistic nativism), or essentialize cultural characteristics by presenting them as uniform and immutable (culturalism).

Many of us have gone along with these customs not just out of careerism or ignorance. Often, we have seen the tactical nod to essentialism and nativism as a low enough price to pay for our continued ability to teach about the otherwise neglected tongues and places that matter to us, to our students and their families, and to the world. But there can come a time when a once tolerated discrepancy reveals itself to be malignant, and admitting as much is no less than a professional responsibility. This is that time.

In this charter, we, the undersigned, insist on a courageous and rejuvenated rationale for teaching languages, and we encourage other practitioners, researchers, and learners to join us. We reject the so-called wisdom of subordinating language and area studies learning to the needs of securitization and privatization. We reassert as our professional idiom a sense of civic responsibility and social agency, by naming the language-teaching needs that befit a truly democratic society in the twenty-first century. It is with these needs in mind that we intend to continue our work.

First, how did we get here?

The Cold War, as a global conflict tangled up with post-imperial decolonization, did not, of course, invent the first strategic rationale for language teaching in the US. Languages had been an established pillar of West-centric liberal arts education, inextricably tied to traditions that considered knowledge as tantamount to mastery over other lands, their peoples, resources, artifacts, and futures. But the Cold War did put languages and the burgeoning area studies under the guiding purview of US state security and its institutional management. To quote anthropologist Benedict Anderson, “under these new conditions, the more powerful American elites became acutely aware of how little they knew about many parts of the world in whose politics they now expected to play a key role” (A Life Beyond Boundaries, 34).

The National Defense Education Act (1958) was tone-setting. It not only initiated the Modern Language Association’s language course enrollment censuses but also authorized and subsidized dozens of area studies centers, several language institutes, and substantial modern language and area study fellowships, normalizing the securitarian agenda in higher education for decades to come. Present-day government initiatives, such as the US State Department’s sponsorship of “critical need languages,” are likewise the Act’s direct descendants. The burden of the securitarian paradigm became glaringly obvious on September 19, 2019, when the US Department of Education expressly meddled with university curricula by threatening to pull funding from the Duke University-University of North Carolina Consortium for Middle East Studies for helping university students understand “the positive aspects of Islam.” It is our responsibility as language teaching professionals to stand with our colleagues at Duke-UNC, whose expertise and humanity in their teaching provide a forum for exploration beyond mere national security strategy.

The wane of the Cold War and the takeoff of the “digital revolution” in communications technology circa 1990 opened up the world, enabling flows of capital, intellectual property, and information across national borders. The fast-paced globalization of capital and labor has created conditions for marketing language-learning as a commodity and for classifying language users as “consumers” or “exporters” (Hogan-Brun, Linguanomics, 130). Whereas the securitarian agenda had mandated that knowing specific languages benefit the state, the neoliberal approach has presumed the universal pursuit of individual gain and competition over, say, community well-being, and this presumption ties in with national and global economic rationales in subtle ways.

This explains why the bulk of studies on the benefits of language learning and bilingualism has focused on the cognitive agenda. Proponents of the so-called “bilingual advantage” insist that language learning ostensibly improves brain activity by intensifying blood flow and mobilizing executive function (e.g., attention and memory). They suggest that it also physically alters the brain, correlating with higher gray matter volume in the left inferior parietal lobule that is linked to language acquisition, mathematical abilities, and hand-object interaction. For the young, the argument goes, this means larger vocabularies, higher emotional intelligence, better math test scores, more versatile career opportunities. To the aging, learning languages allegedly offers a 5.1-year delay in the onset of Alzheimer’s, keeping patients more functional even at advanced stages of the illness.

While the debate about the substance and extent of the bilingual advantage is open and likely to persist as more studies are conducted and published, we question the emphasis on this perspective at the expense of other social considerations. A recent review of 65 empirical studies published between 2005 and 2011 reports that “although 33 studies addressed cognitive benefits, the development of positive attitudes toward other languages/cultures was investigated in only three.” The personal-growth story, we argue, has been opportune for this stage in post-industrial capitalism. It has matched the corporate push for branded “wellness” and, in the same breath, played into the cross-border accounts of economic growth, which render positive correlations between capitalism and the number of spoken languages statistically obvious. In the UK, the All-Party Parliamentary Group showed in 2017 that Britain would stand to lose £50 billion due to its disinvestment from language instruction. Countries like Switzerland, conversely, are consistently shown to attribute their prosperity to linguistic plurality. The formula is simple: the more languages are put to work, the more extensive the trade relations are and the higher the exports levels. For individuals, increased earnings and improved career prospects follow as though organically.

In the face of decreasing enrollments in language programs, language professionals have taken to describe speaking a language as an asset and learning one as an investment. But in reality, the securitarian and neoliberal rationales for language learning advance a hierarchy of very few languages allegedly more strategic or profitable than all others. This leads to the attrition of many language programs on our campuses, which, in turn, weakens linguistic diversity in the world outside. Especially hard hit are the Indigenous, minority, immigrant, and sign languages, which, with the exception of ASL, systematically fall by the wayside in discussions of college language requirements and curriculum-building, just as the supposed financial windfall of multilingualism eludes minoritized bilinguals who have learned those “less marketable” languages at home.

As teachers, we do not deny the possibility of some private, corporate, or intelligence and strategic gains from the study of languages and cultures. What we do deny is that touting and honing these gains ought to be the primary learning outcome framing how we educate, when so many glaring societal and planetary needs for language are staring us in the faces. These include increasing wealth and wage disparity, access to education, healthcare and other resources; voter disenfranchisement, criminal injustice and all forms of social exclusion; Indigenous material and cultural expropriation and Indigenous language loss; ethnonationalism, xenophobia, ableism, and all forms of discrimination that operate discursively to produce deadly effects in the world (Hall, The Fateful Triangle, 43-44).

We pledge to adopt a new narrative around encouraging people to learn languages on and off campuses, one that eliminates toxic competition for enrollments among departments in favor of solidarity; one that is empowered to talk back to the government and economic establishments that depend on our expertise; one that no longer grants precedence to national security and privatization rationales in our curricula, learning outcomes, and collegial conversations: In a modern democracy, language-learning is a matter of civic welfare. Multilingualism strengthens communities across dividing lines. Expanded translation services boost minority voting. Access to bilingual medical information lowers the chances of drug overdosing. Personnel speaking more than only English assures adequate health care and takes pressure off the families of the sick. Court stenographers competent with minority languages result in fewer miscarriages of justice against immigrants and people of color. In promoting language learning, we will remind our students of the desperate social media calls for Spanish and Indigenous interpreters amid the Trump administration’s family separation debacles. And of the children like 7-year-old Jakelin Caal, a speaker of the Mayan language Q’eqchi’, whose December 2018 death in detention may have been preventable had the country grasped the diversity of immigrant languages and their speakers’ humanity. Or of linguistic profiling behind the removal of Arabic speakers from flights and law enforcement’s illegal apprehensions of denizens and citizens. It is with these examples that colleges and universities, we argue, must advance language study in the twenty-first century.

Signatures:

Yuliya Komska, Department of German Studies, Dartmouth College

Ervin Malakaj, Department of Central, Eastern, and Northern European Studies, University of British Columbia, Canada

Roberto Rey Agudo, Department of Spanish and Portuguese, Dartmouth College

Alberto Bruzos, Department of Spanish and Portuguese, Princeton University

David Gramling, Department of German Studies, University of Arizona

Steven Seegel, Professor of History, University of Northern Colorado

Rosemarie Peña, Black German Heritage and Research Association

Didem Uca, Department of German, Colgate University

Artemy Kalinovsky, East European Studies, University of Amsterdam, the Netherlands

Peter Erickson, Department of Languages Literatures and Cultures, Colorado State University

Paul Dobryden, Department of Germanic Languages and Literatures, University of Virginia

Stephanie Galasso, German & Dutch, University of Cambridge

Janice McGregor, Department of German Studies, University of Arizona

Evan Torner, Department of German Studies, University of Cincinnati

Peter Schweppe, Modern Languages & Literatures, Montana State University

Ilinca Iurascu, Department of Central, Eastern, and Northern European Studies, University of British Columbia, Canada

Priscilla Layne, Department of Germanic and Slavic Languages and Literatures, University of North Carolina

Muralee Navaratnam, English, ESIEE, Paris, France

Eileen Cheng-yin Chow, Department of Asian and Middle Eastern Studies, Duke University

Regine Criser, Department of Languages and Literatures, University of North Carolina, Asheville

Adrienne Merritt, Department of German and Arabic, Washington and Lee University

Vanessa D. Plumly, Department of German, Lawrence University

Katherine Bowers, Department of Central, Eastern, and Northern European Studies, University of British Columbia, Canada

Kamran Rastegar, Center for the Humanities and Department of International Literary and Cultural Studies, Tufts University

Andrea Orzoff, Department of History, New Mexico State University

Yana Skorobogatov, Department of History, Williams College
Orel Beilinson, Department of History, Yale University
Juliet O'Brien, Department of French Hispanic and Italian Studies, University of British Columbia, Canada
Carl Gelderloos, Department of German and Russian Studies, Binghamton University
Christina Frei, Germanic Languages and Literatures, University of Pennsylvania
Vicente Iranzo, Department of Classical and Modern Languages and Literatures, Texas Tech University
Bradley Boovy, Women, Gender, and Sexuality Studies, Oregon State University
Natalia Jacovkis, Department of Classics and Modern Languages, Xavier University
Sarah McGaughey, Department of German, Dickinson College
Amanda Randall, Department of German, St. Olaf College
Jamie H. Trnka, Department of Classics and Modern Languages, Xavier University
Nicole Grewling, Department of World Languages & Cultures, Washington College
Anne Abbott, Department of Spanish and Portuguese, University of Illinois
Mariana Bono, Department of Spanish and Portuguese, Princeton University
Anika Walke, History and International and Area Studies, Washington University in St. Louis
Becky Butler, Department of Linguistics and Carolina Asia Center, University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill
Rick McCormick, Department of German, Nordic, Slavic & Dutch, University of Minnesota
Henry Reichman, California State University, East Bay (Emeritus) and Chair, American Association of University Professors' Committee on Academic Freedom and Tenure
Tanja Nusser, Department of German Studies, University of Cincinnati
Germán Labrador Méndez, Department of Spanish and Portuguese, Princeton University
Emily Jean Rath, Department of German Studies, Davidson College
Thomas E. Strunk, Department of Classics and Modern Languages, Xavier University
Lauren Brooks, Department of World Languages, Literatures, and Cultures, High Point University
Caroline Kita, Department of Germanic Languages and Literatures, Washington University in St. Louis
Gabriel Cooper, Department of German Language and Literatures, Oberlin College

Birgit A. Jensen, Department of Foreign Languages and Literatures, East Carolina University

Emina Musšanović, Ph.D.

Beverly Weber, Department of Germanic and Slavic Languages and Literatures, University of Colorado Boulder

Gabriel Guillén, Department of Language Studies, Middlebury Institute of International Studies at Monterey

Adam J. Toth, Department of Modern Languages, Roanoke College

Jennifer Leeman, Modern and Classical Languages, George Mason University

Reyes Llopis-García, Department of Latin American and Iberian Cultures, Columbia University

Anna Hudson, Department of German and French, Dickinson College

Simone Pfleger, Department of Women's and Gender Studies, University of Alberta, Canada

Marina Brownlee, Department of Spanish and Portuguese, Princeton University

Michael Meranze, Department of History, University of California, Los Angeles

Tobias Boes, Department of German and Russian Languages and Literature, University of Notre Dame

Per Urlaub, Language Schools, Middlebury College

Matt Pollard, Department of Germanic and Slavic Studies, University of Victoria, Canada

Megan Figueroa, Department of Psychology, University of Arizona

Waitman Wade Beorn, Senior Lecturer, History, Department of Humanities, Northumbria University, Newcastle, UK

Brian E. Crim, Department of History, University of Lynchburg

Nadia Cervantes Pérez, Department of Spanish and Portuguese, Princeton University

Maggie Rosenau, Modern Languages Department, University of Colorado Denver

Nalan Erbil, Department of German, Nordic, Slavic, University of Wisconsin Madison

Sara Pugach, Department of History, California State University, LA

Joela Jacobs, Department of German, University of Arizona

Sara Marsh, Germanic & Slavic Studies Department, University of Waterloo, Canada

Ellen W. Crocker, Global Languages Department, Massachusetts Institute of Technology

Matthew D. Miller, Department of German, Colgate University

Gláucia Silva, Department of Portuguese, University of Massachusetts Dartmouth

Claire Taylor Jones, Department of German and Russian, University of Notre Dame
Geoffrey Winthrop-Young, Department of Central, Eastern, and Northern European Studies, University of British Columbia, Canada

Claire E. Scott, Department of German Studies, Grinnell College

Andrea Dawn Bryant, Department of German, Georgetown University

Magda Tarnawska Senel, Department of Germanic Languages/European Languages and Transcultural Studies, University of California Los Angeles

Carol Anne Costabile-Heming, Department of World Languages, Literatures, and Cultures, University of North Texas

Paul Buchholz, German Studies, Emory University

Jennifer Scappettone, English and Romance Languages and Literatures, University of Chicago

John Noyes, German Studies, University of Toronto, Canada

Kamran Khan, School of Humanities, Universitat Oberta de Catalunya, Spain

Javier Moreno-Rivero, Theoretical and Applied Linguistics, University of Cambridge, UK

Joel Rosenberg, Department of International Literary and Cultural Studies, Tufts University

Neil McMillan, Serveis Lingüístics de Barcelona, Spain

Sarah Shulist, Department of Languages, Literatures, and Cultures, Queen's University, Canada

Esperanza Román-Mendoza, Modern and Classical Languages, George Mason University

Marc Jones, Department of English Communications, Tokyo Kasei University, Japan

Suzuko Knott, Department of German Studies, Connecticut College

Andreas Stuhlmann, Modern Languages and Cultural Studies, University of Alberta

Sarah Vandegrift Eldridge, Modern Foreign Languages & Literatures, University of Tennessee, Knoxville

Karina von Tippelskirch, Department of Languages, Literatures, and Linguistics, Syracuse University

Hester Baer, School of Languages, Literatures, and Cultures, University of Maryland, College Park

Claudia Breger, Department of Germanic Languages, Columbia University

Elizabeth “Biz” Nijdam, Department of Central, Eastern, and Northern European Studies, University of British Columbia

Magda Siekert, Middle East Studies, Dickinson College

Maria Khotimsky, Global Languages, Massachusetts Institute of Technology

Robin Ellis, German Studies, College of William and Mary

Diego del Pozo, Foreign Languages, Towson University

Gwyneth Cliver, Department of Foreign Languages and Literature, University of Nebraska at Omaha

Julia Elizabeth Neal, Department of Art and Art History, University of Texas Austin

Pilar Alderete Díez, Department of Languages, Literatures and Cultures, National University of Ireland Galway, Ireland

Dolores Barbazán, Department of Latin American and Iberian Cultures, Columbia University

Annette Budzinski-Luftig, Foreign Languages, Towson University

Steven L. Torres, Department of Foreign Languages and Literature, University of Nebraska at Omaha

Tania Convertini, Department of French and Italian, Dartmouth College

Antonio Gómez, Department of Spanish and Portuguese, Dartmouth College

Carlos Cortez-Minchillo, Department of Spanish and Portuguese, Dartmouth College

Sebastián Díaz-Duhalde, Department of Spanish and Portuguese, Latin American, Latinx, and Caribbean Studies, Dartmouth College

Irasema Saucedo, Department of Spanish and Portuguese, Dartmouth College

Kianny N. Antigua, Department of Spanish and Portuguese, Dartmouth College

Olivia Albiero, Department of Modern Languages and Literatures, San Francisco State University

Kathryn Sederberg, Department of German, Kalamazoo College

Ana Luengo, Department of Modern Languages and Literatures, San Francisco State University

Peter McIsaac, Department of Germanic Languages and Literatures, University of Michigan

Palmar Alvarez-Blanco, Department of Spanish, Carleton College
Katherine H. Paul, German Studies Department, University of Cincinnati
Petra McGillen, Department of German Studies, Dartmouth College
Edin Hajdarpasic, Department of History, Loyola University Chicago
Laura Edmondson, Department of Theater, Dartmouth College
Monica Black, Department of History, University of Tennessee Knoxville
Sophie Salvo, Department of Germanic Studies, University of Chicago
Pedro Meira Monteiro, Department of Spanish and Portuguese, Princeton University
Victor Sierra Matute, Department of Spanish and Portuguese, New York University
Tina Martin, ESL Department (retired), City College of San Francisco
Alicia Barrón López, Department of Languages and Literatures, University of Denver
Anna Hájková, Department of History, University of Warwick
Michael Swellander, Department of German, University of Iowa
Hannah Vandegrift Eldridge, Department of German, Nordic, and Slavic, University of Wisconsin - Madison
Julie Shoults, Department of Languages, Literatures, and Cultures, Muhlenberg College
John McLucas, Department of Foreign Languages, Towson University
Mohammad Abu Shuleh, Middle East Studies, Dickinson College
Annabel Martín, Department of Spanish and Portuguese, Comparative Literature, Women's, Gender, and Sexualities Studies, Dartmouth College
Jessica Resvick, Department of German Studies and Leslie Center for the Humanities, Dartmouth College
Alison Vacca, Department of History, University of Tennessee Knoxville
Ana Cornide, Department of Spanish and Portuguese, University of Arizona
Natalia Castro Picón, Latin American, Iberian, and Latino Cultures Program, City University of New York/Modern Languages, Brooklyn College
Erika Delacorte, ESL Department (retired), City College of San Francisco
Kyle Frackman, Department of Central, Eastern, and Northern European Studies, University of British Columbia
Catriona Macleod, Department of Germanic Studies, University of Chicago
Joseba Gabilondo, Department of Romance and Classical Studies, Michigan State University
Michelle Moyd, Department of History, Indiana University
Jennifer Evans, Department of History, Carleton University, Canada

Brenna R. Byrd, Department of Modern & Classical Languages, Literatures, & Cultures, University of Kentucky

Tiffany N. Florvil, Department of History, University of New Mexico

Michelle Warren, Comparative Literature, Dartmouth College

Carolyn Rieger, Department of Central, Eastern, and Northern European Studies, University of British Columbia

Luciana Fellin, Department of Romance Studies and Linguistics, Duke University

Jesse Harasta, Social Science and International Studies, Cazenovia College

Gizem Arslan, Department of World Languages and Literatures, Southern Methodist University

Heidi Schlipphacke, Department of Germanic Studies, University of Illinois, Chicago

Karin Maxey, World Languages Center, Northeastern University

Juliane Schicker, Assistant Professor of German, Carleton College

Emanuela Grama, History Department, Carnegie Mellon University

Marissa Moorman, Department of History, Indiana University

Josh Shepperd, Department of Media or Communication Studies, Catholic University of America

Paul Steege, Department of History, Villanova University

Nichole Neuman, World Languages and Cultures, Indiana University - Purdue University at Indianapolis

Johanna Mellis, Department of History, Ursinus College

Daphne Warren, German Teacher, Plano Senior High School

Matthew Childs, Department of Germanics, University of Washington

Christian Ruvalcaba, Confluentcenter for Creative Inquiry, University of Arizona

Margherita Pampinella, Department of Foreign Languages, Towson University

Margarita Ribas Groeger, Global Languages, Massachusetts Institute of Technology

Francisca Aguiló Mora, Department of Latin American and Iberian Cultures, Columbia University

Carrie Smith, Department of Modern Languages and Cultural Studies, University of Alberta

Gerald Roche, Senior Research Fellow, Department of Politics and Philosophy, La Trobe University, Australia

Luciana d'Arcangeli, College of Humanities, Flinders University, Adelaide, Australia

Katharine Khamhaengwong, MA Student, Department of Central Eurasian Studies, Indiana University

Travis Seifman, Department of History, University of California, Santa Barbara, Project Researcher at the University of Tokyo Historiographical Institute

Gabriela C. Zapata, Associate Professor, Department of Hispanic Studies, Texas A&M University

Daniel Bessner, Henry M. Jackson School of International Studies, University of Washington

Gilad Sharvit, Department of Philosophy and Religious Studies, Towson University

Josh Prada, Department of World Languages and Cultures, Indiana University-Purdue University-Indianapolis

Alexandra M. Hill, Department of International Languages and Cultures (German), University of Portland

*Katrina Day Thompson, Department of African Cultural Studies, University of Wisconsin
- Madison*

Anjeana K. Hans, Department of German Studies, Wellesley College

Kristin Dickinson, Department of Germanic Languages and Literatures, University of Michigan, Ann Arbor

Erin Papa, Educational Studies and World Language Education, Rhode Island College

Val Sevilla, Grafton High School, Yorktown, VA, and Christopher Newport University, Newport News, VA

Lauren Shizuko Stone, Department of Germanic and Slavic Languages and Literatures, University of Colorado Boulder