

Hey, I was staying up last night analyzing your stuff and looking at different people on Udemy in the Python section, and the majority of the “most popular” courses lack vital things.

Like projects which are the only way to evolve as a programmer, they also skip steps in the teaching process and the networking part where you have to make use of the skills you earned.

You have something unique, no wonder it's the fastest-growing course from the newest section. You have this golden opportunity where students keep flocking to your course right now and it would be a shame for the traffic to die out so now is the perfect time to build on this momentum.

There are a few things I took from your top competitors and you already have all the stuff we need, we just gotta put it out there in the correct way so it's attention-grabbing.

If we can do this, you won't rely anymore only on Udemy to sell your courses, and you'll help many more people from now on.
