Reading Comprehension- The History of Sweets in America

During the 1700s, candy was rare and imperfect in the USA. Most sweets were imported from Europe, making them too expensive for regular families to purchase. Instead of smooth bars, people consumed chocolate as a warm, thick drink mixed with strong spices like cinnamon and nutmeg. Making candy at home was a slow, difficult process. Bakers had to stir sugar by hand in heavy pots and carefully protect it from burning.

By the 1840s, new factories used steam power to produce candy much faster and cheaper. Penny candy shops opened in American towns, selling small sweets to children cheaply. However, fresh milk chocolate was still so expensive that only rich people could afford it. The recipe was a secret kept by candy makers in Europe.

This is when Milton Hershey entered the story. Born in 1857, Milton grew up learning about these changing factory methods and worked hard to make good quality chocolate cheaper for normal people in America.
