

Then came time for The Invisible String ! If you don't own this book yet, get it. It's so great for any type of missing someone. After reading, we briefly talk about how it connects to the end of the year – getting scared about something, missing people, and feeling connected to important people no matter what. Then we take turns passing a skein of yarn across the circle, saying kind words to one another. It starts with one student holding the end, picking a classmate across from them, and saying something kind about them.

The yarn gets passed to the next person, looped around their finger, and continues until everyone has had a turn and it goes back to the first person again. If the teacher isn't already sitting with us, I suggest a student pass it to him/her. We continue until the last person passes it to the first person. After we're done, we take a moment and marvel in the web of connection that we've created.
