Why is it the case? What can be done to attract more local people to visit these places?

Bài làm:

In this day and age, more and more attention has been placed on the contentious issue that a plethora of museums and historical buildings are considerably attracted by a large proportion of tourists in lieu of local occupants. This essay will justify some compelling rationale associated with this propensity and suggest some measures to tackle the imperative problem.

To commence with, this proposition is driven by two main driving forces. Chief of these is that travelers coming from distinctive regions desire to have opportunities regarding grasping a profound understanding of other cultural heritages. This is because unearthing historical monuments and storytelling can provoke the visitor's sense of curiosity, which can broaden their horizons about other traditions and cultural identities. In addition, the explanation why financial returns from historical sites and museums are usually dominated by the tourists is that the local dwellers have had constant exposure to their own culture and history. Therefore, losing interest in familiar things is an understandable action, triggering them not going back to these sites the second time. \Rightarrow nếu còn dư giờ thì cho 1 ví dụ ở đây

Indeed, numerous initiatives should be implemented to address the aforementioned complication effectively. One primary solution is for the state to allocate funding to preserving and promoting historic sites campaigns including imposing new infrastructure or maintenance of old structures, lasting the beauty of these and attracting visitors. Furthermore, it is the local citizen's obligation to educate their community about the importance of maintaining the core values of their own historical backgrounds such as conserving the national identity. As a result, this can act as a precursor to attract more visitors in the long run.

All things considered, there are the aforementioned justifications for more tourists choosing museums and historical sites as a destination. Only by the actions enlisted are adopted can the tourism industry likely to thrive in the foreseeable future.
