in South Africa, Elon Musk knew pain and it.

were preparing to stitch him up, he resisted being treated until he was promised that the dog would not be punished. "You're not going to kill him, are you?" Elon asked. They swore that they wouldn't. In recounting the story, Musk pauses and stares vacantly for a very long time. "Then they damn well shot the dog dead."

His most searing experiences came at school. For a long time, he was the youngest and smallest student in his class. He had trouble picking up social cues. Empathy did not come naturally, and he had neither the desire nor the instinct to be ingratiating. As a result, he was regularly picked on by bullies, who would come up and punch him in the face. "If you have never been punched in the nose, you have no idea how it affects you the rest of your life," he says.

At assembly one morning, a student who was horsing around with a gang of friends bumped into him. Elon pushed him back. Words were exchanged. The boy and his friends hunted Elon down at recess and found him eating a sandwich. They came up from behind, kicked him in the head, and pushed him down a set of concrete steps. "They sat on him and just kept beating the shit out of him and kicking him in the head," says Kimbal, who had been sitting with him. "When they got finished, I couldn't even recognize his face. It was such a swollen ball of flesh that you could barely see his eyes." He was taken to the hospital and was out of school for a week. Decades later, he was still getting corrective surgery to try to fix the tissues inside his nose.

But those scars were minor compared to the emotional ones inflicted by his father, Errol Musk, an engineer, rogue, and charismatic fantasist who to this day bedevils Elon. After the school fight, Errol sided with the kid who pummeled Elon's face. "The boy had just lost his father to suicide, and Elon had called him stupid," Errol says. "Elon had this tendency to call people stupid. How could I possibly blame that child?"

When Elon finally came home from the hospital, his father berated him. "I had to stand for an hour as he yelled at me and called me an idiot and told me that I was just worthless," Elon recalls. Kimbal, who had to watch the tirade, says it was the worst memory of his life. "My father just lost it, went ballistic, as he often did. He had zero compassion."

and I was giving maximum business margin. This was my business idea.

Only one thing was left: what if my formula burned somebody's hands or caused some kind of reaction? Because I didn't have any kind of chemical background, I didn't know whether my formula was safe or not. And I had only Rs 10,000 in my pocket, so I couldn't even afford a consultation with an expert.

So, I used my special student power.

The biggest student power is begging. Students beg everywhere for everything. They beg at home for permission to do things, they beg at college for attendance, they beg friends to lend them money, they beg restaurants for discounts—they just beg for everything. So, I used this power to convince people to

In return, he took Rs 2000 from my Rs 10,000. But now I was sure of my formula.

Now, with the remaining Rs 8000, I was able to make 200–250 500 ml bottles priced at Rs 45 each, and I had my stock ready to conquer the world.

From this initial stock, I gave out free samples to my college friends. The person using the product in their house liked it, and I got reorders. I expanded my reach and gave free samples to other students in my college, and later on to the entire college. And with every five free samples I gave, I received at least three reorders. I started selling in bulk, which was beneficial for both my customers and me. I came to be known as the dishwash king of my college and thus began my entrepreneurial journey.

Key Takeaways

1. You don't need millions in investments to back you in order to start something. Start with whatever you have, and grow it.
2. Keep trying different ways of reaching your goals, irrespective of how unconventional they are.

10 Build, Don't Talk

because of some false sense of superiority. Being in either one of these groups is stupid. You wouldn't want to suck and be stupid at the same time, would you? If you belong to the first category, you're self-criticising without even giving yourself a fair chance. If you are so critical of yourself, what will other people do? You have heard that song, Kuchh toh log kabenge, logon ka kaam hai kehna, right? So, let the log say, no?

And if you belong to the second category, that is, remaining stuck at something when you know you are bad at it and yet not ready to let go, let me tell you, you're even more stupid. Be it a course, a relationship, or a job, when it's not working, it's just not working. You need to admit the fact instead of trying to fight the obvious.

Do you remember a time in school when you went to a stage and completely forgot what you were about to perform? I remember it happened to me. I was supposed to perform on a stage. I went up to the stage and started, 'My name is ... mani and this is the thought of the day ...' I completely forgot what I had to say. ... blank! I your weakness and overcome it with the help of your capabilities. It's basic SWOT analysis.

For me, I know I suck at writing and how did I get to know that? By trying it first. And I absolutely sucked! Then how am I writing this book, you ask? Simple: I hired a ghostwriter to write this book for me. Because, at the end of the day, I just want my thoughts to reach you—I don't care who is writing them down. And you're not going to bother about who wrote the book; you are just going to care how this book helped you. So, I am admitting that I suck at writing, which is why I hired professional help.

And that's your solution right there. If you suck at something, admit it. But don't just stop at that. Because what you do about it is what makes the real difference.

Most people feel bad about admitting that they suck at a particular thing. In fact, the first step towards growth is to understand that we suck at certain things and that it's completely okay.

I have sucked at a lot of things all through my life and I will get to know about them as you read the book. Sucking at things has always been a constant. But the constant has been how I overcome it.

When I realize I suck at something, I realize I suck at it, I analyse how that thing is for my growth. If it's important, I try to get better at it. If I get better at it, then great! I can go on with my life and find the next thing that I suck at and improve on that.

If something is important and I can't get better at it after trying, then I do what I did for this book: I hired a professional to do it for me.
