

The EU, in check

Chess players often say that before making any move on the board should have an idea even if it is bad. Viscerality and aimlessness always tripping over themselves to defeat. The British have jeopardized the EU with a referendum that leads to departure. A referendum led only by aberrant xenophobic instinct felt by many whites. There has been other reasons. And they have done unthinkingly, without even having an idea-even bad- to help them orientate to know what they will do next. Any seasoned chess player bet that this game's going to lose. In any case, Spain and the EU are on the opposite side of the board. And the movements that we make must be decisive and aggressive. This item has been winning with an exemplary matte. It is the only way to stop extremists and populists like other countries referenda want to do. Tartakower said: "A clear gloss isolated pawn across the board." UK has become such an isolated pawn. If it entertains you, everyone will want to be him. Watch out.
