2020-21 VIP Case Competition Description

Prologue

Eosinophilic asthma (EA) is a subtype of asthma that is often severe. In EA increased numbers of eosinophils are present in blood, lung tissue, and sputum, and these patients also frequently suffer from chronic sinus disease and nasal polyps¹. EA occurs more frequently in patients who develop asthma as an adult, but also occurs in children and young adults. Childhood severe asthma is predominantly eosinophilic and almost a quarter of children with severe asthma have persistent airflow limitation.² The exact prevalence of EA remains debated, however about 10% of asthma cases are classified as severe refractory asthma³. Shortcomings in currently available treatments for EA is a critical issue. Recently, there have been targeted therapeutics approved by the FDA that focus on key cytokine inhibition in the eosinophil development pathway. Innovative formulations that include optimal pharmacokinetics, pharmacodynamics, and safety/efficacy outcomes are needed.

Case Profile

Your pharmaceutical company has recently discovered a new biologic entity (NBE), Actlizumab, an interleukin-5 (IL-5) antagonist humanized monoclonal antibody indicated for the treatment of severe asthma.

Preclinical studies conducted in rodents and non-rodents have demonstrated preclinical safety that is comparable with similar medications currently on the market; no concerning safety signals have been found that would limit development in a pediatric population. In addition to asthma, clinical investigation of IL-5 antagonists have been seen in other eosinophilic conditions. The early development teams have received approval from internal governance to develop a first-in-human clinical study protocol and file an investigational new drug application (IND) with the FDA. However, there is still room for differentiation of this promising treatment. For example, it might confer a pharmacokinetic advantage of a less frequent dosing schedule or fewer drug-drug interactions.

Your company now wants to plan ahead and determine all of the appropriate activities and steps that are needed to establish a competitive formulation, gain regulatory approval and bring this NME to patients. Your company has also determined that this molecule will have a pediatric indication at launch. What needs to be accomplished to ensure this innovative therapy makes it to market and successfully reaches the patients who can benefit from it?

Newsletter Guidelines

Authors: Jacob Troeckler

Dear SOP,

Thank you for reading the Student Representative Council Newsletter that has been assembled by the SRC Newsletter Committee. This document is an evolving, representative record of some of the wonderful activities here at the Southern Illinois University Edwardsville School of Pharmacy.

The committee is comprised of two P3 co-chairs, one P2 representative, and one P1 representative. If you have any questions regarding the newsletter, please contact a committee member regarding your concerns.

We request that each organization appoint only one representative to be the author of their page, and each author keep the updates to only one page. If you need more room, we suggest that you link your newsletter page to Facebook or CollegiateLink. Each author will be required to have a short orientation with the committee to review the guidelines.

On your organization page, we recommend that you keep updates for your members to see upcoming and past successful events. Be creative!

The committee will have “editing” privileges. The appointed representative authors will have “suggesting” privileges. The remainder of the school and the public will have “viewing” privileges. The committee will be responsible for the integrity of the document and will regularly approve suggested edits from the authors.

Again, we want to thank you for consulting this newsletter as a resource for event and organization information. Stay tuned as we develop this newsletter throughout our time at SIUe.

Sincerely,

SIUe SOP SRC Newsletter Committee

Jacob Troeckler (P3 Chair)

Brett Norvell (P3 Representative)

Hannah Dietiker (P1 Representative)
