Investing in education of girls could be one of the investment with the highest return in Tanzania There is wide spread perception that better educated women are able to process information and use goods and services more efficiently. Evidence from many studies demonstrate that in the long run, increased education for women could contribute to improve quality of life and enhance national development through increase economic production, improved hygienic practice, Educated women are better prepared to provide healthcare, to educate their children and reduce their fertility to desire level.

In Tanzania, children acquire gender role identity as a consequence of differential treatment, expectation and reinforcement given to girl and boys by their parents, teacher, and society. Cultural factors have a pervasive influence on the situation of female education. The Tanzanian culture has an inherent gender bias which adversely affect females. These customary practices include early marriage and parental preference for a wife and mother role for daughters. These strong shape the aspiration of girls and they may drop out of formal schooling system prematurely, either physically or intellectually.

Among the strategies taken by the government to ensure that girls enrolled in primary school on equal number as boys include the enactment of the Education Act of 1969. The act provide legal backing to ensure that children were not withdrawn from school before complementing the primary school cycle. Also important was the introduction of Universal Primary Education in 1974 and the Education Act No. 25 of 1978, Which gave the government power to enforce compulsory enrolment and attendance of girls and boys in schools. Through these efforts the gross enrolment ratio reached 93 percent in the late 1980s.

However, the quality of primary education in Tanzania has suffered from underfunding and pupil's development of critical thinking has been undermined by class size and for girls particularly, by a curriculum which perpetuates gender stereotyping.
