

Pre-Blaseball

Adamses has a flourishing culinary career which started long before they joined the Dallas Steaks. They are the owner of the food truck Adams's, renowned throughout Dallas for its delicious grilled foods and its effort to educate the community about food and culture. The truck has a selection of books and a cart of tablets to facilitate learning, and Adamses also frequently holds cooking demonstrations from the truck to show off easy and simple recipes that can be made at home.

Their culinary career began as a line cook at Mina Cuisina, the restaurant owned by former Dallas Steaks player August Mina. Over the years, they slowly worked their way up until they were Mina's sous chef. The two also became close friends, and though Adamses left to start their food truck and Mina stepped away from her restaurant duties to become a Blaseball player, they remained in touch. Adamses would frequently watch the Steaks play home games at the George Foreman Stadium and sometimes opened their food truck there on game days.

Recruitment to the Steaks

Adamses' Blaseball career commenced with the incineration of August Mina at the end of Season 9 as a result of the Kill Your Darling blessing. Adamses had been in the middle of a cooking demonstration when they were suddenly teleported into the Steaks dugout, wearing a Steaks jersey, immediately after the blessing took effect. Though they had no prior Blaseball, let alone splorts, experience, they joined the team in order to avenge their friend. Blaseball analysts are uncertain whether Adamses was recruited due to their connection to Mina, or for more arbitrary reasons. Nevertheless, Adamses fits in well with the Steaks' philosophy of grillin' and chillin', and the team particularly enjoys their signature char siu dish.

As of the end of Season 11 of Internet League Blaseball, Adamses is the only active pitcher in the league with a half-star rating (all other pitchers have at least one star). They are reportedly aware of this fact, and have been observed spending extra time after practice in the bullpen. However, this sometimes leads to overuse injuries such as tendonitis, and Adamses has been advised multiple times by Steaks captain Conner Haley and assistant pitching coach August Mina (who was resurrected as a forest sprite), to take it easy. They have taken this advice to heart and realized that the team welcomes and supports them regardless of their Blaseball skill.

Post-Siesta

After the Grand Siesta, Adamses returned to pitching for the Steaks. Over the course of Season 12, they became known for frequently giving up runs, a phenomenon that Steaks fans coined "Real Kit Hours." Adamses became aware of a plan by Steaks Fans to Foreshadow them for a better pitcher and met this fate with more than a little trepidation. However, this Will did not pass at the end of the season. On Season 12, Day 99, Adamses partied for the first time and doubled their pitching stars from one-half to one, marking the end of their tenure as the worst active pitcher in the league. Now, “Real Kit Hours” is chanted by fans to indicate the timespan of any game that Adamses is pitching, regardless of whether the outcome is desirable or not.

Trivia

- Adamses’ hugs are legendary among their friends and teammates.
- When accompanying teammates to a concert or similarly high-energy venue, Adamses can always be counted upon to bring snacks and water.
- Adamses enjoys programming visual novels for their pre-game ritual.

References

- <https://archiveofourown.org/works/27678245>