

Nature, God's own handiwork, will never cease to amaze me. It's so awe-inspiring that He made and engineered every little detail in nature — and all the big details, too. It's worth spending time in nature and truly appreciating it.

It has everything necessary for life to thrive (which is not a coincidence or something that randomly occurred, by the way). Think about how complex and unique a planet must be to support life, and then think about how complex and unique the body of every living thing is.

Everything is so perfectly and intricately made down to the last cell or molecule. If even one little thing was off, we might not be able to live.

It is truly astounding.

It's even more astounding when you realize that God created this world for us — even though He knew that sin would enter His creation and stain it. Yet He still loved us so much that, no matter that knowledge, He blessed us with all of nature.

I think that we're often divided over the earth nowadays, specifically with how it was created, how we should take care of it, etc.

The answer to these can be found in the Bible, though — God created the Earth and all in it, which is the truly important part over knowing the exact ways, and we should absolutely take care of it and recognize that we're having problems doing that because God gave us the Earth.

As humans, we are constantly curious and searching for answers. But maybe we weren't meant to always find the answer. Maybe we were meant to take it all in, instead.
