Wight really didn't know how he ended up in this situation. It didn't make any sense and he stared blankly at his paws as he sunk into the snow. He was easily the smallest one there, and perhaps the weakest as well. He was an emperor who only really had any skill in using illusion magic so what was he doing being the one to help Bloop and Paprika face their fears?

"It was scary!"

"Absolutely terrifying"

"We haven't seen anything like it before!"

The two other dragons were babbling behind him as they followed in Wights footsteps and he found their endless noise slowly grating on his nerves. They had been going on for at least half an hour about just how scary this beast of theirs was, and he just wished that they might go quiet like the other companion they had. Unlike Bloop and Paprika Wight had a small feline curled up on his back. The celestial feline had rested happily between his shoulders and was as quiet as a mouse despite how they were being buffeted by the frozen mountains winds. They never uttered a word of complaint and always just followed after Wight happily wherever he went- never made a single demand either. Why couldn't Bloop and Paprika be like that as well?

The creature that they were complaining about that had scared them so badly was a deer. Beyond that they didn't seem to have much information, but they had said that there was something wrong with that deer. It was the most vague and useless description of some nightmarish creature that Wight had ever heard and while he had agreed to track it down for them and put an end to it- he found himself pausing.

"...Why don't the two of you have Hjati hunt this down for you instead of me?" Wight asked with a tired look over his shoulder. Bloop and Paprika had both been playing the game of trying to step exactly where the smaller emperor had stepped but they paused at the question to stare at him as if he was the idiot here.

"He's always busy- you're not."

Bloop answered the question so simply and Wight just sighed loudly at the answer before turning away. Right, sure, of course. He was the idiot for not knowing that. Grumbling under his breath Wight continued the journey forward until he reached the location that the pair had claimed to see this terrifying deer. The angora lowered himself close against the snow, his snow white fur blending in seamlessly to the winter landscape and he slowly moved up over the hill to peer down.

Just as the pair had described there was a herd of deer down below them- but that was it. There was nothing unusual about them, nothing strange at all. They were simply wandering through the mountain ranges, leaving prints in the snow with every step and looking up to gaze at one of the nearby evergreen tree's. While foliage wasn't very common within the frigid mountains there was the occasional tree, and as the deer looked over to it Wight found himself ready to snap at Bloop and Paprika. They had dragged him away from Omen just for this- just to hunt a regular herd of deer and as he prepared to rip the pair apart for their incompetence the scenery in front of him changed.

The head of the deer that had appeared normal split open, falling apart almost as if a flower was blooming and a thick tendril shot out towards the tree. Within the blink of an eye it was grabbing a bird that had been nesting within it and dragging it back into it's... opening? Mouth? Then once it was secured the petals of flesh once more closed into the shape of a deer head. The bird was gone, as was any of Wights lectures.
