

Read this first!

If you want to play in this game, you need to be an experienced player. While this seems harsh to newer players, the following reasons show why we have taken this stance.

Having a character at this level requires:

- Significantly more dedication than your average game. This is not an Adventure Path starting at level 1.
- Attention to detail (both in character creation and in gameplay). More in next point.
- Keeping up to date on ALL gameplay posts. Sometimes it is hard to catch everything, but when players repeatedly and consistently miss details they they should have caught? It bogs down the game while we suddenly have to check because you didn't bother to make sure you knew the spell you were casting.
- A solid understanding of the rules with a willingness to learn more about them and often as questions come up. And believe us when we say that those questions will come up.

General Conduct

- Anyone who wishes to make a character needs to keep calm during this process. It will be long and drawn out. If you find yourself getting upset, just take a break. This is a forum which facilitates being able to think things through a lot more than a tabletop game. It is advantageous to work on this when in a refreshed state so as to have the mindset needed to understand everything that is being done.
- Being that this is high-level play, it is expected that the players post 2-3 times a week on average. As for quality, there needs to be more than "I move here and attack", or "I cast a spell and do (action)" when the spell hasn't been fully read and comprehended.

- In a game like this, there needs to be a lot of thought in many of the posts you will make. All players need to link URLs for the said class/racial ability (or what have you) in their posts to ensure the info is easily found and understood. Not doing this means it unnecessarily drags down a game in an already slow gaming medium.
- That being said, this is just a game. No need to treat it like it is serious business! We have seen enough of people acting like real life shouldn't barge in on just about any point of the game. It stands to reason that everyone has seen enough of that to last a lifetime. Real life can and does come up, more often for some players than for others. Bottom line: don't treat gaming like it is more important than the people who play. That attitude is not welcome here.