One Podcast Episode Choice: NPR's Code Switch: What Does 'Hood Feminism' Mean for a Pandemic? with Mikki Kendall
Ideas that Resonate	Developing Insights	Impacts on Self
- In 2017, after Donald Trump was Elected, there was a feminist march due to the worries of Trump taking away Woman's Rights Hood Feminism: Woman of color who do the work to take care of their family and fight for their rights - You can be a hood feminist and be super rich or very poor - Feminism should be the support of all women, no matter how much wealth they have - The virus hit poor communities and women of color the most - If people of color leave the country due to inequality, the economy will be destroyed Social Safety Nets: People (especially rich and white people) need to realize that without the poorer, people of color, they're lives become a lot harder. - Feminists should be present and active for any kind of politics	- There needs to be more representation for mid-lower class women of color - Feminist women of color just want to be heard and respected	- Not until a year ago or so, did I really know what women of color and from the mid-lower class go through - Growing up, I feel like I was “protected” from what actually goes on in the world - I enjoyed listening to this because I feel more educated on the matter wealth. I wish that growing up, I was shown what life is really like for all people instead of being in my ignorant little white child world. I find it fascinating how this pandemic hit the wealthy because they did not have the mid-lower class working below them keeping them afloat. I hope that this pandemic showed just how important these hard workers are for the community. This pandemic has been very hard for single mothers trying to support their families. Especially mid- lower class women of color, this virus has been even more hard on them trying to get groceries, health care, and education for their families. Hood Feminism as Mikki talked about, is women who put in the work to support their families, mainly women of color. As a community, we need to learn how to care for each other and make sure that everyone is represented.

Like Totally Whatever • Old white men make lots of decisions in politics • Women “making up rape stories” • Women have to stay on the defense • Referring to women as “its” • All women want is to be beautiful • The “Like and ums” Hijabi • People asking about the Hijab and their hair • Embracing their Hijab • Stigmas about Hijabs • Women equality • Haters can leave	• Old white men make a lot of decisions in politics and are the ones who make choices for everyone • Men blaming women for rape • Walking around getting scared about being raped or told they are wrong • Men objectify women • The stereotype that men are the educated ones and women just make babies • Talking like how “a women would talk” • Not respecting different religions • Normalizing wearing hijabs	• Over the past couple of years I’ve been trying to forget about stupid stereotypes on women and just being myself • Empowering

The Poem Like Totally Whatever is about how old white men make a lot of the decisions in politics and how they make decisions and laws for everyone, which is dumb because old white men cannot speak for all communities. Men like to objectify, degrade, and devalue women and their beliefs. Women get raped and speak out about it, and somehow the blame is put on the women. Women are objectified and have to constantly be alert at all times in hopes of not getting cat called, kidnapped, or raped by men. Melissa calls women “it,” to show how men objectify women. Stereotypes about women only caring about how they look and dressing up for the men, is ridiculous. In the song Hijabi, Mona sings about how people are always questioning women who wear hijabs. The song is about embracing women who wear hijabs and women equality in general. This poem and song are very empowering and send a strong message.

One Article or Essay Choice: [This is What a Feminist Looks Like] by Barack Obama

- Extraordinary time to be a woman - Obama loves raising his daughters, and showing them that all men should be feminists - Women now making up half of the workforce - Still a lot of work needs to be done for women rights - Stereotypes start the moment the doctor says its a girl - Obama was raised by women - We need to change	- Women who are raised by feminist men grow up more confident and with higher expectations for the men they let into their lives - Although we have come far with equality there still is a lot of work to be done - Not only laws need to change, but we need to change ourselves - We can't give up on equality - Men need to stop making women feel as if they need to look,	- Makes you feel glad that we have come so far with equality - But also is upsetting how far we still have to go - I am happy that the men in my life are feminists, I think every woman needs that to feel loved and empowered. - Everyone deserves to be loved no matter their gender or race or anything

the attitude that tells men to be assertive and women to demure - Men shouldn't be threatened by a woman's success - Stop congratulating men for doing the minimum - Women cant be confident and ambitious without being called bossy - Teach young women to speak up when they feel something isn't right - Stereotypes limit our ability to be ourselves - When everyone is equal we are all free	act, or think a certain way to be accepted in society. - "I want them to know that it's never been just about the Benjamins; it's about the Tubmans too."

In this article that President Obama wrote, he talks about how he is raising his daughters as a feminist and what challenges there are in the world that put women down. He thinks that it is important that his daughters have a feminist as a dad because now thats what they except of all men. Women used to only be able to work at crappy jobs that had terrible pay, but now women make up half of the work force and can make enough to support a family on their own if needed or wanted. Women have come a long way in the last 100 years and 50 years and Obama says even the last 8 years he was in office. Although there are still so many things setting women back that we don't even see. For example stereotypes, they start the moment the baby is born and the doctor says "It's a girl" from then on women are put down to believe they need to be a specific way to fit into society. Women are told that they can't be confident or ambitious because they are too bossy. A lot of what needs to be changed isn't laws, it's within ourselves. When everyone becomes equal, we will all be free.

- Everyone can see feminism in a different way - Feminism isn't just hating men - Aesthetics, beauty, and fun still matter when you are a feminist - Protest march vs online organizing - Feminist blogging is the new consciousness raising	- Growing up is about rejecting the past then promptly reclaiming it - Patriarchy or intersectionality - Immigration is also an issue of feminism - Not just one face or icon, thousands of men and women can be role models for feminism	- Encouraging to read and learn more about feminism - Same as the last one, but I can somewhat relate because I grew up with a family full of feminists

In this ted talk by Courtney Martin called " This Isn't Her Mothers Feminism " she talking about how her mother raised her to be a feminist but how she sees feminism differently and how there is no right or wrong way just as long as we all have the same main goal. Her mom says Patriarchy and she says intersectionality. Her mom says pretest march and she says online organizing. This is just the difference between the era and generation they were born in. She says that there are three paradoxes you have to accept, one: growing up is about rejecting the past then promptly reclaiming it. Two: sobering up about our smallness and maintaining faith in our greatness. Three: aiming to succeed wildly and being fulfilled by failing really well. So to achieve being a great person and a feminist you must "Embrace the paradox. Act in the face of overwhelm. Love people well."
