

It has come down exactly where it said it was, but we did it did take a while to find it. I did get a bit worried that we were going to be walking around this field for hours looking for this thing. I thought maybe it had fallen right down onto the ground and we just weren't going to see anything, any evidence of it. But we found it. And I'm absolutely delighted that we found it Ohbots working.

Looks like it got a bit of it of mud on its eyeball, but I think apart from that it's all good.

Well, here we are, at a farm in Norfolk, and it's now about 4 hours after Ohbot was launched by the children and staff at St Mary's Primary School in Hornsey.

It was quite a tricky retrieval this one it. You saw it at the height of the crops in the field there, it was really tricky to see but, fortunately, we had that really precise information about its location from the tracker. So that really helped us to locate it very precisely. So it was the most difficult, but not an easy one, either.

So I think probably now it's time to give Ohbot a rest and switch its power down after it had a bit of an eventful journey.
