

JC Kinnaird

Tech. Lit

Professor Wolfe

3/13/17

The Buddy System

With establishing the buddy system into a classroom you must first know all of your student weak points and strong points. You need to know that so you can properly group them together. When you buddy the kids together you want to make sure you give each student a specific task. Each student should perform the task given and help their buddy out if they need any help. As the time goes on in the year you want to make sure to switch the partners and still maintain getting the work done. With switching partners you get to see who works best with each other and who doesn't. This helps at the end of the year when you have to pick partners again and everybody has already been with each other. The most important thing you get from using this system is allowing all of the kids in the class to become friends while still working together at a good pace.