

Title: The Night Librarian

Author: Christopher Lincoln

Pages: 248

Genre: Fantasy (Graphic novel)

Summary: "Bad news, Ms. Literati. I've no idea what you were doing last night, but there were two escapes. Fortunately, I managed to arrange for a discreet repair crew to cover the dragon mess. ... And that confounded beanstalk is now back in the book. But I didn't have time to sort out the remaining leaf." "Is there anything I can do?" [answered Ms. Literati]. "Think up a good cover story for these ..er..irregularities. That would help. I do know these things happen from time to time. But be more careful, would you? Next time we both might be sacked. ... And you know as well as I that could have terrible consequences. Even the library's complete destruction. Say, if something worse than a dragon escaped its book." Page and Turner are twins, often left on their own by their globe trotting parents. Feeling a little neglected, Page decides to take one of their father's treasured books (Bram Stoker's Dracula) to the library to check on its value. But disaster strikes when they lose the book in the library. They volunteer to help the night librarian in exchange for a chance to look for the lost book. However, things seem to be very weird at the library. A dragon imprint on the ceiling and a giant beanstalk just don't seem to be ordinary things one would find. The night librarian explains that magic builds up in books, and the night librarian must do sanctioned releases of characters in order to prevent a catastrophic eruption, although lately characters have been escaping without the librarian's knowledge. Page and Turner decide they can still look for their lost book while helping the librarian return the characters to their rightful books. They just didn't count on all the characters they would encounter along the way - including Dracula?
