Current Wiki Entry

Appearance

The player known as Lotus Mango is composed of two discrete entities: A Model L5-CR63 (Construction Robot) produced by the now-defunct Lotus Co., and a mango tree (Mangifera indica). Examination of the robot has revealed extensive wear from time and exposure to the elements, with numerous repairs having been made over the course of their Blaseball career. According to reports made by team captain Stijn Strongbody, the two “have created a sort of symbiotic relationship [...] Aside from supplying each other with energy, they’re almost connected on a deeper level than physical. Separating them would be a bad idea.” Additional investigation has shown that the connections between the mango tree’s nervous system and the artificial intelligence of the robot mimic the interconnectedness of the human brain. Additional research to investigate this phenomenon is pending.

Affinity for Blaseball

Despite their original function as a construction robot, team members have noted that Mango has taken to blaseball surprisingly well. Lift fans attribute this to the fact that “lifting I-beams all the time isn’t that different from lifting a bat, if you think about it.” Any attempts to investigate Mango’s source code for more information have failed, as in addition to poor style practice and numerous sections of code that seem to be entirely unused, the code seems to rewrite itself at a rate that makes any live analysis impossible.

Personal Life

Neither Mango herself nor her teammates seem to know her exact age, though radiocarbon dating suggests the mango tree was planted approximately 50 years prior to the start of Season 1. Mango has shown close attachments to all members of the Lift and is reported to be a strong force for promoting mindfulness and positive mental health practices among the team. Mango frequently lacks the ability to communicate vocally (likely due to a mechanical failure) and instead communicates primarily using sign language.

When not playing Blaseball, Mango has often been spotted in the mountainous areas to the northwest of Tokyo. When approached by fans, she will invite them to sit with her in silence, and observe nature. Those who participate in this ritual report feeling “oddly comforted. I mean, she’s just a robot with a tree, right? But I feel like she gets me. I might have to try this on my own sometime.” When Mango was approached for comment, none was given.

A Completely Unrelated Story

In the year ■10, an unknown object from the sky crash landed in a remote, non-urbanized corner of India. Agents from the Intelligence Bureau worked with the few locals who resided there to investigate the crash.

One of the survivors testified that the 'unknown object' seemed to be some sort of pod or vehicle, and it housed creatures much like those found ■■■■■. These creatures literally adapted by taking the form of the local flora, and upon noticing they were being watched, would ■■■■■.

Subject-1 and Subject-3 were captured. Subject-2, Subject-5 and Subject-6 were terminated. Subject-4's status remains ■■■■■.

Background

Lotus Mango is a player for the Seattle Garages. A creature of unknown origin, Lotus claims to be "from the stars", which is weird because no one is just "from the stars". From Below, from Elsewhere, sure, but from the stars? That doesn't seem right.

Mango claims that her species reproduces asexually and that they don't natively have a concept of gender. In fact, she and her friends initially came to Earth "for reproductive purposes", but after doing a little bit of road tripping, Mango had come to love the creatures of Earth ("Especially those who play the splort of Blaseball!") and decided to change plans. As of this writing, Mango hasn't elaborated what one had to do with the other.

Despite the lack of sex or gender in her species, Mango identifies as 'female', because "They tend to be prettier, and I just think that's kind of neat."

Appearance

When not assuming a bipedal form, Lotus Mango looks akin to a cephalopod whose tentacles are made of tropical tree roots. Her 'head' contains one giant glowing eye, surrounded by a bush of leaves for 'hair'.

When making public appearances, Mango adjusts her form so that her many limbs more closely resemble two arms and two legs. She does this not only to make others feel more comfortable, but also because she believes two arms and two legs is the optimal form for Blaseball, a splort that she's gotten quite good at.

Optional: Corporates versions?

Gremlotus

- Eats slower
- Bites people to be mean

-Gives poisonous frogs [\[Please take good care of them, frogs are still frogs :plead: -Raz\]](#)
