

Spanish

In the process of creating my lesson plan I learned a lot. I learned about student centered classroom, common core, DOK levels, etc. I learned that when you make a lesson plan you need to create a question that will interest the students into taking your course. I learned that students are more likely to be interested in your class if you have a really good question that can attract them to the topic. I also learned that in order to have a student centered classroom the lesson should be student centered. What this means is that students should have different ways to learn the material, that it should be something that interests them, that it should be fun and engaging. This can be done in class and online to have variation and different ways of learning. The lesson plan I created focuses on using twitter as the source of information for our class. This can be engaging for students because they will be able to share, comment, post, and have online interaction with others, and also in class. The information that they learn could be presented at the beginning of class. They could share and then we could all argue about the topic. This will create critical thinking, and in the process think deeply about current events in our world. It will help them see current social media apps in a different way, in a way that it helps their learning. I have proven that this actually works better well by using my twitter account to follow educators. I have learned a lot from twitter, from youtube. I have created some lesson plans for my class from the examples I got from other educators and I think this is why this lesson could interest others.

Why am I teaching what am teaching?

I am teaching spanish because I want to motivate my students to never give up on education and made them realize that learning a new language is possible if they want to. I want to make them realize that can't and want is not the same. That if you say you you can't is because you don't want. If you want something you can do it regardless of how possible or impossible it seems.
