“The red sharing library below is not a Little Free Library, but rather an art installation that is only up for summer before the structure moves back to its job as a warming hut on the frozen Assiniboine River for the winter. But again, in the same neighbourhood and this time across the street from the park. In addition to the rear-facing garages, the high numbers of schools, places of worship, parks, and corner pubs increase our propensity to mix and mingle. Without the monotonous sameness enforced by the design constraints on the homes in many suburban locations, a little red or blue library at the curb isn’t such a shock to the system.”

(January 17, 2020)

In this blog post, the blogger describes the first attempt at a library and how it was ruined from bad weather. The use of a newspaper dispenser was the second try.
