TP01 Passage 1: Question 1

Which of the following can be inferred from paragraph 1 about the ground that we walk on?

☐ A. It cannot hold rainwater for long periods of time.

☐ B. It prevents most groundwater from circulating.

☐ C. It has the capacity to store large amounts of water.

☐ D. It absorbs most of the water it contains from rivers.

The corresponding paragraph number is highlighted.

Groundwater is the word used to describe water that saturates the ground, filling all the available spaces. By far the most abundant type of groundwater is meteoric water. This is the groundwater that circulates as part of the water cycle. Ordinary meteoric water is water that has soaked into the ground from the surface, from precipitation (rain and snow) and from lakes and streams. There it remains, sometimes for long periods, before emerging at the surface again. At first thought it seems incredible that there can be enough space in the "solid" ground underneath to hold all this water.

[2] The necessary space is there, however, in many forms. The component spaces are those among the particles—sand grains and tiny pebbles—of loose, unconsolidated sand and gravel. Beds of this material, out of sight beneath the soil, are common. They are found wherever fast-moving rivers of coarse sediment once flowed. For example, the great ice sheets that covered North America during the last ice age slowly melted away, huge volumes of water flowed from them. The water was always laden with pebbles, gravel, and sand, known as glacial outwash, that was deposited as the flow slowed down.

[3] The same thing happens to this day, though on a smaller scale, whenever a sediment-laden river or stream emerges from a mountain valley onto relatively flat land, dropping its load as the current slows. The water usually spreads out fanwise, depositing the sediment in the form of a smooth, fan-shaped slope. Sediments are also dropped where a river slows on entering a lake or the sea. The deposited sediments are on a lake floor or the seafloor at first, but will be located inland at some future date, when the sea level falls or the land rises, such lands are sometimes thousands of meters thick.

[4] In hilly country almost any spot on the ground may once have been the bed of a river that has since become buried by soil. If they are now below the water's upper surface (the water table), the gravels and sands of the former channel, and its sandbars, will be saturated with groundwater.

[5] So much for unconsolidated sediments. Consolidated (or cemented) sediments, too, contain millions of minute water-holding pores. This is because the gaps among the original grains are often not totally plugged with cementing chemicals also, parts of the original grains may become dissolved by percolating groundwater, either while consolidation is taking place or at any time afterwards. The result is that sandstone, for example, can be as porous as the loose sand from which it was formed.
