The conflict of interest statement guarantees the credibility, confidence, and transparency of the scientific process that concludes with its publication in specialized scientific journals, after peer review.

There will be a conflict of interest in cases in which the validity and integrity of an investigation are influenced by a so-called secondary interest, such as economic benefit, ideological positioning, or other personal or professional interests.

The authors of scientific articles submitted to journals considered for publication have the responsibility to inform about the economic, ideological, personal, and professional relationships that could give rise to a conflict of interest. The same thing applies to all the people in charge of the review.

When there is no conflict of interest, this situation must be explicit in the "Declaration of conflict of interest", setting up, on behalf of the correspondent author, that there is no such conflict.
