Apply Magic Sauce

I truly believe that how we act at our jobs and in our personal lives are different, and that's perfectly okay. We're not made just for a particular company; we're more than just our job titles. Our work is only a part of who we are, not our whole identity. The social media we use is mostly for personal stuff and doesn't have much to do with our jobs, as long as it's not the company's own social media.

Even though everything we do seems to involve the internet these days, it doesn't mean we should share every little thing online. So, this idea of a Magic Souse trying to figure us out doesn't sit right with me. I don't think it's fair to dig into people's private lives just to offer them a job. Plus, not everyone likes to use the internet.
And if the judgment is based on our private info, it could easily lead to unfair treatment. See, AI measures things in a totally different way than humans do. It just looks for the best fit, often overlooking morality and humanity.. That can end up being biased. Our performance at work also depends a lot on our daily mood, and machines won't understand our reasons, even if they're totally valid.

In the end, relying on some Magic Souse would take away our humanity and make work a bit of a mess. There are decisions that need a human touch, something AI can't really get.
