

AI Tools in Education

Bilge Dilara Doğan 101022073 & Meryem Kasap 101022073

1. Interview with Malala Yousafzai
2. Report
3. Feedback
4. Revised report with explanations

Interview with Malala

Me: Hello Malala, I hope you are well. You have a lovely name! Can you tell me who gave it to you and if it has any special history or meaning?"

Malala: smiles warmly Why, thank you so much! You see, my name Malala was given to me by my wonderful father, Ziauddin Yousafzai. He is the one who has always encouraged and supported my passion for education and standing up for what I believe in. The name Malala actually has a really special meaning. It comes from the name of a famous Pashtun poetess and warrior woman from long ago, Malalai of Maiwand. She was known for her bravery and courage in leading troops into battle. My father chose this name for me because he wanted me to embody that same spirit of strength and determination. He knew that having a strong, meaningful name would help inspire me to be brave and stand up for what's right, just like the original Malala did.

Me: That's really a wonderful story. What inspired you to become a supporter of girls' education?

Malala: nods enthusiastically Ah, that's a wonderful question! You see, my passion for girls' education really began at a very young age. Growing up in the Swat Valley of Pakistan, I was fortunate to have a father who believed deeply in the importance of education for both boys and girls. From the time I was a little girl, he would take me to the local schools and encourage me to speak up.. He instilled in me the belief that education was the key to unlocking a world of possibilities. But as I got older, I began to see the stark differences in the opportunities available to girls versus boys in my community. I just couldn't understand why girls were being denied the same chances as the boys. So when I was just 11 years old, I decided to raise my voice. I wanted the world to know that we are just as capable, just as deserving of a chance to learn and grow. That decision, to stand up and fight for what I believed in. You see, my young friend, education is not just about reading and writing. It's about unlocking our full potential as human beings. And every girl deserves that chance, don't you agree?

Me: Of course, I agree, that is one of the most important things. It is expected that our environment affects us as a person in many aspects. Do you think your environment affected your views about education in general?

Malala: nods thoughtfully You know, that's a wonderful observation. Absolutely, my environment and the community I grew up in played a huge role in shaping my views on the importance of education, especially for girls. That's why I was so inspired by my father's unwavering belief in the power of education. He was a teacher himself, and he made sure that I, as a girl, had the same chances as the boys to learn and grow. I realize that my environment - both the natural beauty and the social injustices I witnessed - fueled my passion for education reform. I wanted to be a voice for the girls in my community who were being left behind, to show them that they too could achieve greatness through the power of knowledge.

Me: I also believe in the impact of the environment on us. What role do you think education plays, especially in ensuring gender equality and including women and girls in social life?

Malala: eyes shining with conviction You raise such an important point, my young friend. When girls are kept out of school, they are denied the chance to develop their full potential. They may be forced into early marriage or domestic labor, their dreams and aspirations cut short before they even have a chance to blossom. But when girls are given the same educational opportunities as boys, the transformative impact is incredible. Educated women become leaders in their communities, innovators, and agents of positive change. They are more likely to have healthier families, earn higher incomes, and actively participate in the political and social fabric of their societies. Education empowers women to find their voices. I believe that when we invest in the education of women and girls, we are investing in the future. It's the surest path to achieving true gender equality and building a more inclusive, prosperous world for all. What do you think, my young friend? Do you see the power that education has to transform lives and communities? I'm so eager to hear your thoughts on this important issue.

Me: Definitely, I also want to be an English teacher in the future, I hope I will be one of the people who help the world change. Starting and continuing an action is often scary and requires strong motivation, how do you deal with these challenges?

Malala: smiles warmly and nods Ah, that's wonderful to hear that you aspire to be an English teacher! You know, I can't think of a more noble and impactful profession. Helping to educate and empower the next generation is truly one of the most important callings we can have. And you're absolutely right - taking on big challenges, like fighting for girls' education, can be incredibly daunting and scary at times. There have been many moments where I've felt overwhelmed or uncertain, wondering if I have the strength to keep going. So whenever I've felt scared or unsure, I've reminded myself of the young girls I've met - the ones whose eyes light up with hope when they realize their dreams of going to school can come true. And I draw strength from the support of my loved ones. You know, my young friend, I truly believe that the most courageous and impactful actions often start with a single person, and when we come together, we can achieve truly incredible things.

Me: You are absolutely right. Thank you for your encouragement. What are the most important challenges girls face in their education? And, how can we fix these?

Malala: You know, that's a really important question, my young friend. The challenges that girls face in accessing quality education are complex and multifaceted. One of the biggest barriers is deeply rooted cultural and societal norms that place less value on educating girls. In many parts of the world, there is still a persistent belief that a girl's place is in the home, taking care of household duties or getting married at a young age. Another major challenge is the lack of access to safe, inclusive schools, especially in rural or impoverished communities. But you know, my young friend, these challenges are not insurmountable. With the right policies, resources, and societal shifts, we can absolutely break down the barriers that keep girls from accessing the education they deserve. Do you have any ideas on how we can work together to overcome these challenges and ensure that all girls can access the transformative power of education? I'm eager to hear your thoughts.

Me: We are definitely on the same page. It is disappointing that much of society does not value women's roles enough, there are even countries that deny women's right to education. How do you think these norms can be changed? And how will this change contribute to the well-being of society?

Malala: nods solemnly You're absolutely right, my young friend. The persistent devaluation of women's roles and the denial of their right to education in many parts of the world is truly heartbreaking and unacceptable. One of the most powerful ways to challenge these entrenched beliefs is through education itself. When we invest in educating girls and women, we are not only empowering them as individuals, but we are also sowing the seeds for broader social transformation. But changing deeply entrenched cultural norms is no easy feat. It requires a multi-pronged approach that addresses the systemic barriers and biases that keep girls out of school. This means working with governments to enact policies that prioritize girls' education, and collaborating with local communities to challenge harmful traditions and stereotypes.

Me: I hope we can witness these changes by starting to respect each other. Your story has reached millions around the world, largely thanks to social media platforms. Do you think social media plays a very important role in raising awareness on important issues such as girls' education? If not, how can we effectively use social media as a tool for advocacy and change?

Malala: nods thoughtfully You raise an excellent point, my young friend. Social media has indeed played a crucial role in amplifying my story and helping to raise awareness about the importance of girls' education around the world. But you're right to question whether it is being used as effectively as it could be. The viral nature of social media has helped to shine a spotlight on the challenges that girls face in accessing quality education, sparking important conversations and debates. When people see the realities that girls in places like Pakistan or Afghanistan are facing, it can help to galvanize support and spur action. However, I've also witnessed the limitations of social media when it comes to driving real, sustained change. Too often, we see a cycle of outrage and awareness that quickly fades, without translating into tangible policy shifts or grassroots action. That's why I believe we need to think more strategically about how we leverage social media as a tool for advocacy. And crucially, we need to use social media to hold governments and institutions accountable

Me: The power of social media cannot be ignored, its influence affects more people than we can imagine. You won the Nobel Prize relatively young compared to others. How did you feel when you won the award?

Malala: smiles warmly and nods. You're absolutely right, my young friend. Winning the Nobel Peace Prize at such a young age was truly a profound and humbling experience for me. When I first learned that I had been selected as the recipient, I was overwhelmed with a mix of emotions. There was immense pride and gratitude, of course - pride in the work that I had done, and gratitude to all the people who had supported me along the way. But there was also a deep sense of responsibility, a realization that this award came with an even greater obligation to continue fighting for the cause of girls' education. And so, when I stood on that stage in Oslo to deliver my acceptance speech, I made a solemn promise - that I would use this platform, this global spotlight, to amplify the stories and struggles of girls everywhere.

Me: I think we can constantly talk about it, that would raise awareness around the world. We can motivate people to do something about it. What advice would you give to young people who are eager to create positive change in their communities?

Malala: nods thoughtfully. That's such an important point, my young friend. Constantly talking about the importance of girls' education and motivating people to take action is absolutely crucial for lasting change. My advice to any young person who is eager to create positive change in their community would be this: Never underestimate the power of your voice and your actions, no matter how small they may seem. So I would encourage you, my young friend, to find your passion, to identify the issues that matter most to you, and to start taking action, no matter how small. The key is to start somewhere, to take that first step, and to keep moving forward, even in the face of obstacles. Because change doesn't happen overnight - it's a slow, steady process that requires persistence, resilience, and a deep commitment to the cause.

Me: Thank you for this inspiring speech Malala. I hope we will meet again in a better world.

Malala: beams with pride and gratitude Thank you, my young friend, for this wonderful conversation. It has been an absolute honor to share my story and perspectives with you today. Your insightful questions and thoughtful engagement have been truly inspiring. I leave this exchange feeling even more determined and hopeful about the future, knowing that there are young minds like yours who are eager to create positive change in the world. So please, keep that spark of passion and determination alive. Continue to be a beacon of hope and inspiration for others, just as you have been for me today. Until we meet again, my young friend, I wish you all the best in your educational journey and your efforts to drive positive change. May your light continue to shine brightly, illuminating the path forward for generations to come.

Thank you, and may peace be upon you.

Report

Interview with Malala Yousafzai

Introduction:

We had an insightful conversation with an iconic education activist Malala Yousafzai on education, gender equality, environmental effects, and her experiences. This report will summarize the main points of the interaction and provide information about Malala's opinions.

The Meaning Behind Her Name, Malala:

The name was given to her by her father Ziauddin Yousafzai, who always stood beside her on her precious journey. Malala is a poet known for her bravery. Such a suitable name for our Malala, they are both the symbols of determination and strength. She says that her father knew what was he doing while naming her, he wanted her name to have a meaningful effect on her life.

Inspiration Behind Her Becoming a Supporter of Girl's Education:

Malala knew the importance of education since she was born. However, while growing up in Pakistan, she couldn't make sense of why girls were being denied their education rights. Seeing the possible future for those women in oppression, she couldn't stay silent and started blogging about the issue. She believes in equity in education and fights for it.

Environment's Effects on Her Life:

Malala agrees with the impact of the environment by saying "My environment fueled my passion for education reform." Her perception of education started with her father, a teacher, and one of the factors that made her the person she is today. Also, the social injustices made her realize that the importance of this issue.

Education's Role in Ensuring Gender Equality:

Malala said, "Education empowers women to find their voices. When we invest in the education of them, we are investing in the future." She believes in the power of education for an equal world. Moreover, she finds it important to allow women to discover their potential through education.

Maintenance of an Action:

Malala acknowledges the hardships of being under pressure from her work; however, that's what also makes her keep going, like making girls hopeful about their future. She also mentions she can rely on her loved ones' support.

Solutions for The Challenges Girls Face in Their Education:

Malala collects the problems under 2 headings: cultural and societal norms and lack of accessibility to education. Even though these problems are complex and look unsolvable, she is hopeful about changing them for a better world.

Changing Harmful Stereotypes for Women:

Malala believes the only way to achieve a community without gender biases is through education. She says, "Working with governments to enact policies that prioritize girls' education and collaborating with local communities to challenge harmful traditions and stereotypes."

Social Media's Role As an Awareness-Raising Tool:

Malala agrees that social media has raised awareness and garnered support by highlighting the challenges girls face in accessing education around the world. It also recognizes its limitations in driving sustainable change; This often results in temporary anger without concrete action. Malala emphasizes the need for strategic use of social media.

Feelings About Winning a Nobel Prize:

Winning the Nobel Peace Prize at a young age was both humbling and overwhelming for Malala. She felt a deep sense of responsibility, as well as pride and gratitude, to continue advocating for girls' education. When she took the stage in Oslo, she promised to use her platform to amplify the voices of girls around the world.

Advice For The Young Generation About Activism:

Malala emphasizes the importance of constantly advocating for girls' education and motivating others to take action. She advises young people to recognize the power of their voices and actions, encouraging them to identify their passions and begin making a difference, no matter how small the effort may seem. By emphasizing permanence and commitment, she underlines that change is a gradual process that requires endurance and determination.

Feedback

Feedback on Interview with Malala Yousafzai

Areas of Strength:

Detailed exploration of Malala Yousafzai's background and influence

Clear explanations of Malala's views on education and gender equality

Engaging storytelling that captures the reader's interest

Areas for Growth:

Try to vary sentence structures for more fluidity in writing

Work on transitioning between ideas more smoothly for better coherence

Consider incorporating more vivid and descriptive language to enhance storytelling

General Feedback on Writing Mechanics:

Remember to capitalize proper nouns like "Pakistan" and "Nobel Peace Prize"

Check for subject-verb agreement to ensure sentences are grammatically correct and clear.

Revised Report and Explanations

Interview with Malala Yousafzai

Introduction:

We had an insightful conversation with iconic education activist Malala Yousafzai on education, gender equality, environmental effects, and her experiences. This report will summarize the main points of the interaction and provide information about Malala's opinions.

The Meaning Behind Her Name, Malala:

The name was given to her by her father, Ziauddin Yousafzai, who always stood beside her on her precious journey. Malala is a poet known for her bravery. Such a suitable name for our Malala; they are both the symbols of determination and strength. She says that her father knew what he was doing while naming her; he wanted her name to have a meaningful effect on her life.

Inspiration Behind Her Becoming a Supporter of Girl's Education:

Malala has known the importance of education since she was born. However, while growing up in Pakistan, she couldn't make sense of why girls were being denied their education rights. Seeing the possible future for those women under oppression, she couldn't stay silent and started blogging about the issue. She believes in equity in education and fights for it.

Environment's Effects on Her Life:

Malala agrees with the impact of the environment by saying, "My environment fueled my passion for education reform." Her perception of education started with her father, a teacher, and was one of the factors that made her the person she is today. Also, the social injustices made her realize the importance of this issue.

Education's Role in Ensuring Gender Equality:

Malala said, "Education empowers women to find their voices. When we invest in their education, we are investing in the future." She believes in the power of education for an equal world. Moreover, she finds it important to allow women to discover their potential through education.

Maintenance of an Action:

Malala acknowledges the hardships of being under pressure from her work; however, that's what also makes her keep going, like making girls hopeful about their future. She also mentions that she can rely on her loved ones' support.

Solutions for The Challenges Girls Face in Their Education:

Malala collects the problems under two headings: cultural and societal norms and lack of accessibility to education. Even though these problems are complex and look unsolvable, she is hopeful about changing them for a better world.

Changing Harmful Stereotypes for Women:

Malala believes the only way to achieve a community without gender biases is through education. She says, "We are working with governments to enact policies that prioritize girls' education and collaborating with local communities to challenge harmful traditions and stereotypes."

Social Media's Role as an Awareness-Raising Tool:

Malala agrees that social media has raised awareness and garnered support by highlighting the challenges girls face in accessing education around the world. It also recognizes its limitations in driving sustainable change. This often results in temporary anger without concrete action. Malala emphasizes the need for strategic use of social media.

Feelings About Winning a Nobel Prize:

Winning the Nobel Peace Prize at such a young age was both humbling and overwhelming for Malala. She felt a deep sense of responsibility, as well as pride and gratitude, to continue advocating for girls' education. When she took the stage in Oslo, she promised to use her platform to amplify the voices of girls around the world.

Advice For The Young Generation About Activism:

Malala emphasizes the importance of constantly advocating for girls' education and motivating others to take action. She advises young people to recognize the power of their voices and actions, encouraging them to identify their passions and begin making a difference, no matter how small the effort may seem. By emphasizing permanence and commitment, she underlines that change is a gradual process that requires endurance and determination.

EXPLANATION: Feedback showed us where we were good at and where we could improve. We didn't make any changes to the good parts. One of the things mentioned in the feedback about the parts we needed to improve was that it should be more meaningful in terms of flow.

However, this is an interview, not a story, and we tried to prepare as meaningful a sequence as possible while preparing the flow of questions. One of the things mentioned in the feedback about the parts we needed to improve was that it should be more meaningful in terms of flow. However, this is an interview, not a story, and we tried to prepare as meaningful a sequence as possible while preparing the flow of questions. When we read more carefully, we noticed these mistakes and made the necessary changes.