Umbrapolis

Light and liberty those are the only two principles of Umbrapolis, which ironically is the city that never sleeps. On the surface, a capitalist 's wet dream, where everything is a servant to the open market, where everything has a price and everything comes at a price. It 's safe to say that the two founding principles of the city have been diluted beyond the point of recognition. Umbrapolis was once the city known for being shrouded in perpetual darkness, thanks to its unusual geography, a rift valley surrounded by an immense network of the world 's largest creature. The flora is a species of fungi so huge, that a single offshoot puts the mighty oaks to shame, being connected to other offshoots via a vast underground network.

The foundation of Umbrapolis, was laid upon this very magnificent entity. A closed off and self sufficient unit that feeds the people who call this valley their home. Built on the very principles that they believe they and the then contemporary world lacked. In a valley shrouded by darkness, they wanted to pursue light, and in a world governed by money, they wanted to be governed irrespective of what one had in their pockets. The next generations, however had different ideas.

The successors of the valley chose to open up the valley to the outer world. In a world where they were born in the dark, the light was nothing but blinding to them. And for the eyes that had yet to see the depths of human greed, polling of resources, to them only brought about scarcity to those who broke their backs.

What this globalization of sorts has done to the domain is undeniable, a miracle nonetheless. Whether this change was a wonder or a disaster in disguise, only time will tell.
