

They shoved their way through Stalactites in the burrogatory, seeing several chirops along the way that they ignored in favor of finding somewhere they could set up camp so they could get the hunt started. it wasn't too bad but he did constantly end up tripping or dragging his feet on occasion but it wasn't too bad over all.

"Let's set up a little camp right here." Hutch said and pulled the back off his shoulders, setting it down he started to pull things out to set up a tent while Oli did the same. He was following Huches' example by that point but after Oli set up his own tent he wandered around to grab some rocks. It wasn't as if he was completely incompetent when it came to camping he just didn't like it. This place was also new so it was a little awkward for him but he didn't want to whine about anything that they were doing. He did agree to help Hutch with this little adventure after all.

It didn't take long for Oli to have set up the campfire, they didn't light it yet since they had gotten there fairly early so it was still light out and they didn't need to get it started at the moment. They did however grab a couple of cages, nets, ropes and bait to hopefully capture the imp they were going after. It was a Lunell, Hutch promised it wasn't going to be a hard capture but it was something he wanted help with this time since he hasn't been able to find them in the last dark bioluminescent cycle he just wanted to have someone so he could extend the area that he was trapping.

It didn't take long for them to separate for a while, setting up traps along their paths and soon going back to camp where they promised to meet back up at. Those traps weren't too bad but some of them were a hassle to get set up, But it happened and he was quite proud of himself that it was all set up and ready to go. That is what he told Hutch when the other bun asked him how it went.

"So now we wait for the cycle right?" Hutch nodded while they were sitting down cooking a late lunch since they both had gotten back a good while into the day but that was fine. Since the Lunell only really came out when it was really dark to begin with. They ate something simple, just a couple of canned foods before they both went to take a small nap, after putting out the fire of course, into the night and they both had made sure their alarms were set but only loud enough that it wouldn't bother anything.

Once they woke up and got ready again they both gathered just a few things and left the campsite, they had made sure to put up a light so they could find their way back to the campsite later after they were successful or not in their hunt.

It wasn't a surprise to Oli as he continued to retrace his steps and took down empty trap after empty trap. The path was long and the night was turning to morning by the time he got to his last trap and he was excited to see an Lunell in the last trap. Oli grinned and walked up to the cage slowly, pulling out a blanket to drape it over the Lunell, hopefully to calm it down as he made the journey back to the campsite to wait for Hutch. This went surprisingly well and he was excited to see Hutch's face.

He had to wait for Hutch to get back and by the time the other bun had returned he had nothing with him, just several empty traps and looking defeated. But seeing the camp slightly packed up and the cycle was changing the lighting so it was easier to see now Hutch had seen the cage and was quickly ecstatic knowing they had gotten one.

“Thank you for helping me out, it means a lot. I haven’t been able to get a Lunell in a while.” Hutch said with a bright smile while he carried the cage gently as they made their way back to the city happy after a successful hunt. “It was no problem, I hope they go to a new home soon after your training is done.” Hutch only nodded while he gripped onto the cage securely to be happy that they had gotten one.
