

Challenges Students Studying English Degrees Might Face

Identifying Skills

Outside perspectives/opinions/self-confidence can make it difficult to see all the skills you have learned and developed during your English degree.

There are external factors that might influence your ability to see the skills and value of your degree. Actively noticing the skills you are developing can help you see yourself as an asset to a future employer.

Making Goals

There can be a lot of pressure to have clear and ambitious goals which can feel overwhelming.

Making short-term, achievable goals is the best way to help you develop your employability.

Identifying Values

It can be easy to disregard your own values when it comes to thinking about your employability.

Knowing your values and how they might influence your employability can help you find a role/career that suits you best.

Identifying Experience

It can be hard to identify all the transferable experiences you have had as part of your degree. It can also be hard to work out what experiences you want to gain.

Understanding your degree experience can help you work out what kind of experiences would benefit you the most.
