This story talk about a girl named Ava who is the tallest girl in the third grade. One day, the shortest girl in the third grade was transferred to their class. Her name was Ava Zafra. In a play, Big Ava was assigned to play the giant because of her height, and Little Ava was assigned to play the fairy, but Big Ava wanted to play the fairy, and Little Ava wanted to play the giant. In the end, the two of them agreed to switch roles and perform for the class.

I like this story very much because height has always been a problem in my life, and this story is just a story with height as the theme. I admire the protagonist very much. Instead of hating herself because of her height, she can find her own advantage in height to balance the good and bad brought by her height. I also appreciate the two people in the story who did not give in to the roles assigned to them by the class. In particular, they finally reached a consensus and exchanged roles to complete the performance, which made me feel very moved. It also made me see that things that are not good decisions can be changed. This story also taught me not to use the outside to decide what others should do. As expressed in the story, maybe others have their own ideas or want to do, we should ask and respect them.
