Interesting how couples can live together for decades without knowing the number one killer of a fulfilling marriage.

I knew it from the first day working as a coach, and my conviction has only strengthened in the last 15 years of working with more than a thousand couples.

It's the first reason why most marriages are emotionally draining and crumble under broken trust.

That's why one change is enough to already get you into a deep soul-pleasing connection with your spouse.

It's something everyone knows deep inside they have to do but often they turn a blind eye or succumb to laziness and fear.

Frankly, I'm talking about boundaries and personal values.

I've witnessed far too many couples lose themselves completely, drowning in insecurities and losing any shred of realness they had in themselves.

This happens 100% of the time when you are unsure of your own identity, desires, and non-negotiables.

The irony is that almost every person I've worked with believed they knew themselves well.

They thought the feeling of being trapped and hopelessness comes from somewhere else.

Asking them 2 essential questions made them instantly realize the pit they got themselves in.

For this very reason, asking the right questions and accepting the real answers will catapult you forward turning around your marriage completely.

So if you want to be able to breathe again and not have to walk on eggshells all the time.
