

A SCOOP OF MILLENNIALS EDUCATION

There's no surprise to be surprised by what Egyptian generations can do. they can distinguish between the highly educated and the well-educated person!! that's why you will notice that Millennials are highly educated than Gen Xers, but Gen Xers have further quality in education. As a result of what happened by the beginning of the 80s, graduating from university didn't mean that you had a good education. it's a simple equation depends on balancing quality and quantity at the same time. This can give you a hint for the upcoming question.

why most of the Millennials are a big fan of a career change?

In the middle of the 20th century, Egypt was a popular destination for young people seeking an education. Students traveled from dozens of neighboring and Muslim-majority countries to pursue a high-quality education at Cairo University or al-Azhar University. This picture has, however, changed completely since the 1980s.

A growing population and little reform in the education system caused it to fall into disarray that led to severely overcrowded and underfunded schools and universities, which have long produced graduates unequipped for the demands of the modern labor market.

Bits and Pieces of Millennials Education Day

Starting with the sunrise when their ears hear their parents' tweets, wearing their dumb schools' uniforms, waiting for their bag sandwich to get ready, and might be listening to the radio to kill sometimes, then end up with carrying on their backpack that keeps their gravity centered and ensuring they won't fly with their imagination. We are not going to discuss the rest of what was happening through the educational day because it will be pointless, but you can watch "3 Idiots" instead. Nevertheless, you can't deny the impact of education on most of Millennials' behavior, thus they are more racists, judgmental, bullies, and aggressive generation.

Millennials and the mirroring mode

The truth is that the open doors policy didn't contribute to reform our curriculum and education policy as they claimed, it just made it worse because nothing has been changed since 1960, instead of the increase in demand for public education which let the door opened to the private education business.

It's next to nothing to mention how much the education factor influence the Millennials mentalities, it was just trying to make a typical generation of the Gen Xers, and somehow it did work, especially with the cooperation of the Mubarak's freezer policy that helped to establish a sense of carelessness supported by the concept of "praise be to God" or "Alḥamdulillāh"
