PERSONAL INFO

Personality ::

amiable + optimistic + hardworking + energetic cryptic = curious = meddlesome
immature - evasive - insensitive - short-tempered

Spending most of his time alone with books, John developed an unusual sense of humor one could only get from being forced to be one's own entertainment. His idea of fun is spouting cryptic nonsense that often leaves people confused or uneasy. In fact, he is delighted by the simplest things and has a generally pleasant disposition, having faced few hardships in his life. He strives not to dwell on anything that gets him down, instead quickly finding a book to dive into or a new project to start and forget his troubles. He convinces himself he has nothing to be gloomy about—he is living a life much more fortunate than others'—and locks away any feelings he deems unnecessary. Regardless, he's always active and making a big hullabaloo.

He never seemed to grow out of his "Why?" phase that many children went through. Because of all his reading, he thinks that he has brilliant plans and often tries to get other people involved to prove his cleverness. When he isn't researching something, he seems to always be running around collecting various doodads for whatever shenanigans he's up to today.

John's appetite for learning about things he's never known before often leaves him offending others, as he asks invasive questions and hounds people for answers. He wants to know everything that is going on, so he spends hours researching and sticking his nose in other people's business. He is quick to anger when people don't understand his explanations or when someone is doing something he can't understand the logic behind. He willfully tells other people how to solve their problems and gets mad when they don't listen to him.

(Truthfully, he just wants to hear them thank him for being helpful.)

In the end, deep down, John is lonely. He won't admit it to himself—and maybe he doesn't even realize it in the first place—but he craves attention and companionship. However, he prides himself in being able to thrive on his own. Because of the conflicting emotions within him, his actions can sometimes appear incomprehensible even to himself. He keeps trying to involve other people in his plans, but he pretends he's fine being alone. He wants to know everything about others, but he's cryptic when it comes to talking about himself. John wants the rewards of being loved without the mortifying ordeal of being known.

Biography ::

John's mother was a clever woman and married up in terms of social status. She was charming and calculating in equal measure, and approached courtship methodically. She pretended to be more naive than she was to curry favor among others as a sweet and good-natured girl. John's father, though a seemingly simple-minded man, saw through his future wife's act. However, he found her quite endearing anyway, and happily asked for her hand in marriage.

Though John's mother wished to be married, she never had a strong desire to bear children. However, having children after marriage was just a thing you do, and her husband was rather keen on having children as well. Despite everything, John's mother truly did love her husband, and so eventually gave birth to John. The happiness John's birth brought to his father made John's mother happy, too.

However, John's mother was not very interested in, well, being a mother. John's father, on the other hand, was thrilled to be a father, but did not have the sense for it. He was very good at playing with John when he had the time, but taking care of a child's needs was another matter. Thankfully, with his status, they could afford a house servant or two, and John was mostly raised by a nanny.

With a cold mother and a silly father, John developed a rather precocious personality. He spent a lot of time playing by himself and knew not to be fussy about his parents' attention, or lack thereof. Despite this, John remained unusually optimistic and cheerful as he continually developed new ways to entertain himself. John's games were very fun, to him at least, but they were too complicated and nonsensical for his peers to play along with. So John did not have many friends growing up. However, he was used to this. His own parents were not around very often, after all.

John was a naturally curious boy with a great hunger for knowledge. He loved asking questions, but because no one was around to answer them (his nanny could hardly answer the unusual questions he would come up with), John took it upon himself to read, read, read. The more he read, the more he learned, and the more his questions would be answered. However, with this knowledge came arrogance. John felt that he was much cleverer than his peers and often meddled in others' affairs, giving them unsolicited advice that he felt was best for them. He would even get offended and angry when people turned down his advice.

As he grew older and dabbled in an assortment of hobbies based on whatever latest trend had caught his eye, it was not long before John developed an interest in law. Lawyers were basically professional arguers, right? John was great at arguing! Wasn't he made for this? When he heard about the Rookie Law Program, he applied right away. Even if this ended up being just another passing interest of his, at least it was just for rookies, right? There was nothing big at stake here, probably.
