

Ultimately I give it to my twin brother and tremendous prayer and praying and praying and praying and feeling as if what I heard in response to those prayers was running for political office. And asking one question which is how do two twins born and raised in the city of Boston have such different life outcomes? And so every day it's a question that I am answering. It's a part of my purpose to answer that question, and I'm looking at the institutions, particularly whether it's government institutions or things controlled by the government, that made a difference in our lives that set us off into two separate paths or life trajectories. Mind being one you might define as successful and his as a failure. And there are institutions, including our schools, that failed him, and now I'm in a position of power and leadership to change that. Not only to share his story but to then say I'm going to do something about the inequities that continue to persist, in our schools, for example.