But clearly they've lost control of the streets. Now is it time to send in the army at some point? Probably yes, but if the army will not be sent in, then the public will have to go in, and the public will have to sort this out themselves, and it'll be very, very brutal. I don't want them to live here. I don't want them here. They came under false pretenses. Many of them came illegally, and continue to come illegally, and we don't want them here. And I'm perfectly willing to say that, because it needs to be said, If I hated Australia, hated the Australian people, hated Australian history, hated the Australian way of life, broke into the country illegally and spent my time trying to undermine Australia. Why should I be in Australia? Why? What would I have brought the country? What benefit, what moral benefit, what financial benefit, what social benefit? The answer is, you'd have brought no benefit. So why? Why? Just hope that those people are not in large enough numbers, and keep your fingers crossed and put it off for another day. I think we have to start saying very clearly, if you don't like it, here go. And if you don't like it here, and you intend to make it worse, we will make you go. We stripped citizenship from ISIS members, members of ISIS, who, even if they had British citizenship, we stripped their passports. We need to start doing the same thing with Hamas. We have Hamas leaders in the UK. Hamas members in the UK. I'm calling on the foreign secretary, the Home Secretary, the Director of Public Prosecutions, the Attorney General, Prime Minister, and others to start doing this, to start taking the passports away and deporting people who support him, as in the UK. Is there the willpower to listen? I think that as the situation is changing, actually, I think there are things now able to be discussed and suggested which were not able to be suggested or discussed even a few years ago. My view is that, I mean, for instance, there's a there's a sort of idiot conversation you can have when it comes to these things, which consists of something like the following, I would say, if this is a typical BBC question for you, you see, I'd say John Anderson, but how do we how do we balance the the the issues between a liberal society and then illiberalism? On the other hand, we've had 20 years of that. We've had 20 years of these silly games and naval gazing parlor games. It's too late to keep playing those games. We have 1000s, 10s of 1000s, probably hundreds of 1000s, of people in the UK who have no love at all for the UK, but yet live here, we have a couple of choices, clearly at this point. One of them is, and I say this metaphorically for the time being, but it's not that metaphorical. One is to stand up, and the other is to beg on your knees. I don't think the British public should be on their knees begging, particularly not people who dislike them so best, to be on your feet the soul of England, the soul of Britain, is about to be trampled on very, very visibly, by people who are gleeful in their trampling, and they have defaced and defiled all of our holy places. And I think I know that the British soul is awakening and stirring with rage at what these people are doing. These people came into our house. Many of them broke into our house illegally. Many of them were never wanted here, and they have come here. They have betrayed all of our attempts at hospitality. They've spat in our faces, and now they want to trample everything we have underfoot. No, no, I
