

A monkey named Geim, whose career was a YouTube channel, becomes the victim of a “small” prank by his best friend, Thomas — one that triggers a doubt and a chain of events whose behavior neither of them can explain.

In YouTubeLand, while Max does absurd challenges with Nugget and Jimmy plays with Tyler, Angus, and Carl... waiting for their reunion beyond the stars, there are two individuals who “stand apart” from those mentioned: Geim and Thomas.

Both characters were best friends. They did everything together — drawing, walking, eating, the usual. Sometimes Thomas got both himself and Geim into trouble because of his actions. In every case, he would run to the “Help Me” button and try to press it, but he never managed to reach it. He doesn’t know that there is someone behind that world helping them. Sometimes things happen even when there is no viewer at all, and Geim has to press the button for him.

Geim is very bothered that Thomas always drags him into problems, yet at the same time he sees him as his best friend, someone he would never hurt — or at least, that’s what he believed.

Geim decided to start a YouTube channel, specifically to upload his drawings, and by chance it began to do well. Thomas saw this and believed he could succeed just like him. He started a gaming channel, but because of his harsh language and the way he mocked other players, he didn’t earn anyone’s affection. The only people who subscribed were Geim, his wife, and his son.

Five months later, Geim’s channel is a success. Thomas remains stuck and has developed envy toward Geim, though he never shows it. When he is with Geim, he wears one face; when he is alone, he shows another.

A few weeks ago, Thomas came up with the idea of playing a “prank” on his friend — making him lose fame. Thomas didn’t think his friend would get angry; he had pulled pranks before and believed Geim would take it well.

He began saving money to buy a raid and launch it during one of Geim’s LIVE streams. After a few weeks, he gathered enough and the day finally arrived.

The LIVE was calm — Geim drawing and later playing with his subscribers. Thomas saw the perfect moment and started the raid. They were all cloned profiles of Thomas, spreading false rumors about Geim and even getting him into trouble. Geim panicked as he watched the hate pour in within seconds, since those same clone accounts posted links to fake images about situations Geim had never been involved in. Unfortunately, everyone believed it. Geim’s image was ruined, and his popularity fell rapidly. He even became the target of public shaming. Geim lost everything he was passionate about, because he had felt loved. Thomas didn’t expect it to work so well. He thought there were only four or seven clones, but he never realized how far it would go. Geim stopped talking to him, and Thomas assumed Geim was simply dealing with the fallout.

Days later, Geim couldn’t step outside his house without receiving hate or hearing people whisper about him. Sometimes he didn’t even want to leave, because even tomatoes mocked him.

After all the hatred, stress, and bottled-up anger, an infection developed in his eye. It offered him the power to defeat whoever had caused his downfall — in exchange for stripping away Geim’s good traits. Without thinking, Geim accepted. His eye turned black, his pupil became a star, and he lost all innocence and kindness. Now he wanted only one thing: to find Thomas.

After these events, Thomas gained everyone’s affection because “he exposed Geim.” Part of him enjoyed it, and part of him felt sorry for his friend — but in the end, he no longer cared.

While Thomas was shopping with his family and parents, at a fair filled with tomatoes like him, Geim was there too. He looked normal, but he had bad intentions. Thomas went on alert, and after a brief conversation and an attempted apology, Geim revealed his transformation. He drew several tomatoes toward himself and killed them one by one, including Thomas's family, only his father could escape.

Thomas was left in shock. He tried to reason with Geim, but there was nothing left to reason with — Geim only wanted to end Thomas.

After a chase, Thomas grows exhausted, and they stop in a meadow beside a tree... what happens next could be the bad ending for Geim, or for Thomas.
