

After reading this story about sea cows, I think from the beginning, the crew members who were trapped on the island seemed to choose to eat sea cows as a last resort. They had nothing to do in order to survive. However, unlike the crew on the island, the later people did not encounter difficulties in life. They hunted the sea cows at will just to want its skin and satisfy their desire for new food. As far as this matter is concerned, later of people don't think about sustainability. Although I can understand people's pursuit and desire for food, of course, because of this reason, not only sea cow, but also many different creatures, among which, because of human desires, they are arbitrarily hunted and killed, resulting in a large reduction in the number or even being killed. Extinct, their numbers are not too small to be ignored. The sea cow is one of the more fortunate species that can attract human attention and protect it earlier. Although humans are already protecting sea cows and other species, and trying to restore them, I think this is very important, not only that, we also need to actively promote similar content, hoping to attract more people's attention and support. Finally, what I want to say is that human beings must continue to maintain a balance between supply and demand. When the restoration activities are going on, we must also remember the lessons of the past, and we must not let this happen again. Perhaps humans will not feel that a large number of hunting has no impact on the environment or ecology in a short period of time, but as long as the time is prolonged, the damage to the environment and ecology cannot be compensated.
