ORPHANED FAWNS? Please read below. This is an excerpt from the US Human Society.

G. Orphaned fawns: This topic should be included in all educational materials and in spring-summer media (See Appendix F for more information):

- That the vast majority of seemingly “orphaned fawns” are NOT orphaned and should be left alone.
- It is common to have fawns “parked” in yards and fields by their mother and as they rely on environmental camouflages for protection. The doe will nurse her fawn twice a day but stays away the rest of the time since her odor will attract predators (fawns are odorless). Once the fawn is about a month old, it will travel around with its mother.
- Only if the fawn is injured, wandering and vocalizing all day, and/or a dead lactating doe is found in the road should the fawn go to a licensed wildlife rehabilitator.
- If the fawn is picked up by a well-intentioned resident, the resident needs to be advised to quickly return the fawn to the original site for the mother to reclaim.

Looks like a pretty weekend River Hills!
