

Infobox:

Rival: Lancelot Kane

Nickname: Queen Pothos

(Addition to Life in Breckenridge)

Pothos' time as the Jazz Hands' shutout queen started off well, with her throwing shutout after shutout her first season with the team. Things began to turn when another former PODS player, Wyatt Quitter, shelled Denzel Scott during a game against the Houston Spies during Season 12. Later that season, Pothos would swallow a peanut, but she was able to resist shelling another player at the cost of an allergic reaction. While she didn't show it to her teammates, Pothos would begin to keep a tally of how many days have passed where she did not shell anyone.

It's unknown what Pothos' opinions are on the echoing of teammate Wyatt Mason II and former teammate Wyatt Quitter into Static over the course of Season 14. Reporters' attempts to interview Pothos on the subject always result in Pothos glaring at them until they went away.

===Return to Breckenridge===

Pothos' time in Yellowstone would prove to be brief, with the Jazz Hands trading back for her after only a season away. She would miss the friends she made in Yellowstone and the time they spent together, but she was glad to be back on the mound. Back in Breckenridge Pothos was able to focus on her old life goal to play all sapphic splorts and would start sapphic splorts rivalries with Lancelot Kane and later, Russo Slugger, in the process. Pothos has also added her former teammates from the Magic to her routine video chats with former teammates.

With her return to the pursuit of sapphic splorts and her new rivalries with others, fans have noticed a new Pothos on the mound - one that was trying her best rather than forcing herself to be the best. Pothos also reportedly founded a new roller dlerby team in Breckenridge that competes in the offseason.

Trivia:

At the end of the Expansion Era, Pothos was the only Honey Roasted player to have never shelled another player.

Pothos is the exact same height as Lancelot Kane, but insists she is taller.