(Adapted from Perspective-Taking by Gale in Context Online Collection)

Every person sees the world through their perspective or point of view. Many factors shape a person's perspective, such as background, education, and social environment. Perspective-taking is the ability to put aside personal perspectives and view the world through another person's point of view. This allows people to better understand how others think and feel, helping to increase empathy and reduce conflict.

Researchers have found evidence that the part of the brain responsible for self-control is also responsible for the ability to understand others' feelings. Behavioral science has found that children develop an early form of self-awareness when they are about eighteen months old and first become self-conscious about their relationships when they are between four and five years old.

Understanding another person's perspective is an important step in learning how to resolve problems, get along with others, and achieve goals.

Assignment:

Describe a time when you were challenged by a perspective that differed from your own. How did you respond, and what was the impact?
