

World's Smartest Hobo Discovered

Image removed for legality.

We will replace as many images
as we can in the future.

Last week, a homeless person was found living under a piece of cardboard in a local alleyway. At first glance, reporters didn't think anything of their discovery, until they realized that the cardboard shack was placed strategically to block out ninety-five percent of rain based on recent wind patterns in the area. They were intrigued, so naturally, they inspected the alley more carefully, and spoke directly to the homeless person in an interview that can be found below. The person, who goes by the name of Devin Billiams, informed them that she had been enrolled in Cranbrook Schools, and had received a college-level education during her years in high school. However, paying Cranbrook's tuition left her family bankrupt, and although she had learned everything that there was to learn in college, she didn't have an official degree, and couldn't get any jobs.

Interview with World's Smartest Hobo

Reporter: Hello, Billiams. How does it feel to officially be the world's smartest hobo?

Billiams: I'm just glad it's finally official. After what happened to my last cardboard shack, it's been hard to get my talents recognized.

Reporter: Of course. Now Billiams, what is your current living situation?

Billiams: I live under a piece of cardboard. Anyway, what's your opinion on Mabel onions?

Reporter: Wait, What happened to the last cardboard shack?

Billiams: I may or may not have "optimized it to provide me with the most nutrients."

Reporter: You ate it?

Billiams: No comment. Also, my friend's wives wanted you to know that they think your face is hideously off-center.

Reporter: Why, what a lovely opinion. Please excuse me for just a moment.

Billiams: Oh joy. Another reporter ran off.